Struggle, as with Sisyphus, unleashes mental energies otherwise lying dormant, a consciousness of societal transformation and individual conviction/commitment only possible under today's conditions of manipulation, surveillance, and a settled war-psychology, when Negation, both as the ability and willingness to say No to the existing structure of power and system of values, is resolutely maintained, in defeat, bloodied, yet rising up again and again, against the organized forces of wealth, power, militarism, together, at bottom, a compost of decaying Empire and its spirit of nihilism. At some point, democratic structure and practice will win out, if one accepts the Sisyphean paradigm of embarking on the quest in the first place and refusing legitimation to the mere affirmation of what exists. One must leap beyond Camus, activating the meaning of the absurd into a militant defiance wherein every meaningless, inhumane request and burden placed on the individual by society is met by a simple yet persistent and resounding NO!

Here Herman Melville's "Bartleby, the Scrivener: A Story of Wall Street" comes into view, its subtitle especially—Wall Street, not Main Street, or Elm Street, or the street Dick and Jane lived on, in my third grade reader—reveals the author's intent, the new archetypal figure of American capitalism surrounded by walls, hemmed in by walls, staring out of his nakedly bare room onto a blank wall, thrown back upon his own resources, tightly-coiled, ready to spring, also, like Sisyphus, storing up the energy to say No to the repression holding him back. We find in Bartleby that No=Defiance=Sought-for Liberation, in a societal context intended to mutilate the individual, destroy his/her will, reduced to a powerless cipher destined to remain in the cubicle which defines the life of alienation. Yet, Bartleby fights back, still in the only way he knows how, "I would prefer not to," in response to every dehumanizing request and/or order made to him: total non-complicity with the SYSTEM, in sum, a silence which is deafening, this deafening Silence, negation at its shrillest, capable of knocking down structures dependent on passive consent—acquiescence in the consumerist rite, even when long out of reach to those mired in poverty.

Those who doubt Melville did battle with alienation (Bartleby's story) or false consciousness in Moby Dick (the struggle of Ahab to assert his personhood) have not come to terms with his critical spirit and inceptive radicalism, Pierre, the novel, falling between Bartleby and Moby Dick from the standpoint of the vital and necessary search for transcendence in an awakening but increasingly false, confining, undemocratic America. Like Sisyphus, the failure of transcendence dooms the individual to the bottom of the mountain, crushed under the rock of capitalism, or perhaps worse, not crushed in body so much as spirit, yielding to the paralysis of will, opposite to the declaration of negation directed against all things repressive. By that I do not mean the repression-free polymorphous sexuality of Marcuse's Eros and Civilization, a vision of liberation having little socioeconomic meaning and content, but Melville's vision of the disciplined pursuit of freedom, transcendence, the epistemological break with a purportedly American Innocence.

Sisyphus and Bartleby, alike, bode ill for the homogenization of American repression; they are rebels where rebellion is not wanted, is in fact a cardinal sin. In our own time, following them, we must say No to war, No to intervention, No to climate change, No to a fiercely unjust system of wealth distribution, No to racism, xenophobia, ethnocentrism, No, therefore, to an American exceptionalism which itself contains the positivism of hegemony, exploitation, repression, and other presumed truths of the human condition. Negation, on behalf of freedom, positivism, on behalf of status-quo repression, Bartleby's "I would prefer not to" an emphatic affirmation of life through the negation of its unjust, inhumane consequences. His statement, in contrast to the narrator's (his employer's complacency), is not contrariness for its own sake, and instead, a principled opposition to the forces of alienation, hence, a manifesto of wholeness to be realized beyond the walls of Wall Street. Bartleby finds no salvation, only imprisonment, starvation, and death within the prison walls, an ending that perhaps awaits us all. But Bartleby, if I may, kept the faith, neither compromising his will nor conceding to the standards of conventional wisdom a moral legitimization which buttresses capitalism against alternative formations and dissenting opinions. Even our narrator glimpses tragedy, when he exclaims at the end, "Ah Bartleby! Ah humanity!"

The fight must continue.

NOVEMBER 11, 2015

Obama-Netanyahu: Siamese Twins of Global Reaction

Theatrical differences aside, the reputed bad chemistry between them, Obama and Netanyahu are two peas in a pod conjoined in ideology by a spirit of amoral cynicism in which unrestrained militarism, passing for diplomacy, seeks out to destroy Enemies of the State, i.e., whomever is in the way of a hubristic nationalism identified with Rightest social forces in domestic as well as international politics. When Emerson says an ocean is a large drop, a drop, a small ocean, he might be describing the US and Israel, one an enlargement of the other, the other the larger in microcosm—the same impulse toward ethnocentrism and xenophobia, the same haughtiness in facing outward, the same rejection of internal dissent, the same need to designate, brutalize, and find societal coherence and personal identity in doing so, a Victim. It is no wonder America hails Israel as its closest friend (who else, for that matter, would put up with US imperialism and claims to unilateral world dominance?), a sentiment fully reciprocated by Israel out of necessity because the community of nations increasingly views it as a pariah state. They are made for each other, a marriage—or so both believe—consummated in Heaven.

It was not always thus. To be sure, America had its share of developmental/incipient fascism since at least the 1890s because the corporate structure facilitated the high concentration of industrial and financial wealth accompanied by a ruthless and repressive labor policy, which by and large holds to this day. Yet there was always valiant opposition to the process of capitalist accumulation of wealth and power in ever fewer hands, social movements of labor rights and civil rights which provided a dimension of democratization otherwise absent from modern US history. Without social protest from society's disadvantaged, exploited, discriminated against, America might have become Germany, given the structural trends found in capitalism toward hierarchy and the Leadership Principle (here, business itself).

Likewise, Israel did not have to become what it is today, namely, a distorted, slightly watered down version of European authoritarianism placing it on the same political latitude as America. World Jewry, pre-1945, possessed a vision and record of humanism which all degree of radicals could proudly affirm and which had ramifying impacts on music, the arts, literature, always in forward motion seeking to transcend the status quo—an implicit antifascism which, had not Israel by 1947 already started to become intolerant, proscriptive, determined on sole mastery of the land, could have carried still further that vision of humanism in a new setting of harmony as exemplified by some aspects of labor Zionism and the kibbutz movement. But it was not meant to be, for reasons I still do not understand. Ever since, Israel has been trending Right, a political pattern of ethnic cleansing (by whatever name one wishes to assign its oppression of the Palestinians—as though the Holocaust gave Israelis license to persecute another people in its stead).

There we are, its crunch time, another Obama-Netanyahu meeting, more theatrical foreplay, as meanwhile the wheels of counterrevolution grind on and military and intelligence communities cozy-up to one another in recognition of a perceived common interest. Which of the two, Israel or America, is dominant, which subordinate, is hard to say, so slavish is US policy to the dictates and will of Israel; that, too, is difficult to understand. Military aid is forthcoming; votes in the UN, the same. If this were merely relations between x and y, one would suspect blackmail was involved; since that is not the case, we are left with a puzzle—fear of being called anti-Semitic, no; intense lobbying by Jewish groups, hardly a full explanation; the role of evangelicals, ditto, leaving us perhaps with a common ideological residue of latent proto-fascism ascribable to the stage of capitalist development requiring militaristic foundations if it is to prosper and flourish.

I turn then to Peter Baker and Jodi Rudoren's New York Times article, "Obama and Netanyahu: A Story of Sights and Crossed Signals, (11-9), for background on their meeting. Again one must delve beneath the surface of personality-differences; warrior-types may disagree over boasting rights, but peel away the vanity and you have the same cunning, the same ruthlessness (as in the way Obama presides over hit-lists and drone assassinations, or Netanyahu, the IDF attacks on civilians, including children), the same coldness therefore in the face of human suffering for which they themselves are responsible. Baker and Rudoren, however, choose to emphasize not policy but personality, although even there much can be learned. They write that back in 2010 the day when Obama signed his health care legislation (big celebration) Netanyahu showed up at the White House and expected royal treatment: "He felt squeezed in, not accorded the rituals of such a visit. No photographers were invited in to record the moment. 'That wasn't a good way to treat me,' he complained to an American afterward." Netanyahu appears like a petulant child holding a grudge.

"The tortured relationship," they write, "between Barack and Bibi, as they call each other, has been a story of crossed signals, misunderstandings, slights perceived and real." Then came the "rupture over Mr. Obama's push for a nuclear agreement with Iran [which] led to the spectacle of Mr. Netanyahu denouncing the president's efforts before a joint meeting of Congress." One is peeved by the other's nerve, yet Iran per se hardly signifies they are "divided by ideology," as the reporters claim, given Obama's own belligerence toward Iran plus the fact that their current meeting is for discussing "a new security agreement and ways to counter Iran." From here, the account takes us to fairyland, for it makes light of Obama's war propensities and reactionary views of which on both counts he certainly can't fault Netanyahu: "Undergirding their personal disconnect are different world views. Mr. Obama sees Mr. Netanyahu as captured by a hard-line philosophy that blocks progress. Mr. Netanyahu considers Mr. Obama hopelessly naïve about one of the world's most volatile neighborhoods." If anything, now with Syria, Obama is up to his neck in adventurism in the region.

The love spat: Netanyahu "feels disrespected and misled by a president he thinks does not have Israel's best interests at heart," while Obama "feels aggrieved at being portrayed as anti-Israel even though he has provided extensive security aid and fought Palestinian efforts to seek recognition as a state at the United Nations." In fact, both can be seen in a poor light, in which unwarranted egotism obscures their objective similarities, the poor light primarily because the policies, not their wounded pride when each tries to best the other, are themselves cruel and vindictive in their reliance on the forcible depersonalization of others. Collateral damage for one, the round-up, rubber bullets, and a knock on the door at midnight, for the other. Yes, there are differences, the freezing of settlements, yet that has not stopped Obama and the US from supplying Israel with arms, etc. Ongoing settlement activity may well be a defining issue, yet American complicity in this as in everything else suggests a timely fabrication of differences is a face-saving device, while nothing in the situation changes, in order for America to maintain its relations with the Saudis and others. The theme, “[w]ith the Iran deal finalized,” is, it’s time to move on. Did anyone doubt that? A reactionary mindset creates a unified bond of solidarity.

As for the meeting itself, coverage has been sparse, and no press conference has taken place. In The Times, Julie Hirschfeld Davis’s article, “Obama and Netanyahu Seek to Move Past Rift Over Iran Nuclear Deal,” (11-9), we find both on their best behavior as though carefully scripted puppets. Obama: “It’s no secret that the prime minister and I have had a strong disagreement on this narrow issue. But we don’t have a disagreement on the need to making sure Iran does not get a nuclear weapon, and we don’t have a disagreement about us blunting destabilizing activities in Iran that may be taking place. And so, we’re going to be looking to make sure we find common ground there.” The ominous words, “blunting destabilizing activities in Iran,” have the ring of regime change about them, but more, seeking “common ground” should dispel any doubts about an Israel-centric Middle East policy framework.

Netanyahu avoided mention of the nuclear accord, instead emphasizing that someday there may be a two-state solution: “I want to make it clear that we have not given up our hope for peace. And I remain committed to a vision of two states for two peoples, a demilitarized Palestinian state that recognizes the Jewish state.” A victor’s peace: occupy so much land as to make the other state a shrunken entity mired in subjugation, one demilitarized, the other with a full nuclear arsenal in addition to police powers and military readiness second to none—and even then, a grudging recognition at best. Significantly, Obama does not dispute the “vision,” however one-sided its practical implementation. He actualizes its unevenness because the main concern of the meeting is “the renewal of a 10-year package of United States military assistance to Israel.” Although the present agreement doesn’t expire until 2017, he “wanted to get a ‘head-start’ on renegotiating it.” We are speaking of a sum in the ball-park of $50B in the time frame.

My New York Times Comment on the Baker-Rudoren article, same date, follows:

Neither leader nor their respective sides has clean hands. The US under Obama maintains a global military posture of war, intervention, regime change, drone assassination, etc., a record creating a framework where proposals of any kind must be viewed with suspicion. Israel has become the US in miniature when it comes to both domestic and foreign policy: belligerent, confrontational, xenophobic and ethnocentric.

Actually, like should attract like, both leaders and their nations in the vanguard of global unilateralism in their respective bailiwicks. But this hasn’t happened, whether because of personal chemistry fallout or the recognition of geopolitical differences. Iran is the touchstone for something deeper: hegemonic claims from which neither the US nor Israel can back down on. I believe we are heading for a midair collision, created not by objective policy differences, but each's solipsistic dynamic of feeling it can act with impunity, an arrogance of power turned against the weak while simultaneously seeking to play an outsize role in world affairs.

Both Obama and Netanyahu should be urged to back down, learn a little humility, pursue a course of peace, for Israel, reconciliation with Palestinians, for America, an end to confrontation with Russia and China. That of course will not happen; if they could exploit their mutual hatreds and failings, perhaps they could then get along better. Meanwhile the world is tired of each.

NOVEMBER 13, 2015

Obama and Keystone XL: A Bastardized Legacy

Obama's rejection of the pipeline extension for transmission of a portion of Alberta tar sands oil on November 6, already the subject of three solid critical articles in CounterPunch, reveals the political and ideological nihilism of his presidency and actions of his administration, an effort at legacy-building when all else has failed. How could it be otherwise, for who wants a legacy of being known as point-man of the American Corporate System (which he is!), obfuscation in the name of liberalism his signature method of operation, deep-seated impulses—even when not showing cause, as though wired into his make-up and belief system—toward war, intervention, regime change, and feelings of power through personal approval of drone assassination, covert action, persecution of whistleblowers, mass surveillance, an identification with the purposes of US global hegemony given practical meaning in the reliance on force and exultation of all things military? When one begins with that context, the archetypal capitalist front man, it is difficult to take seriously his rejection of this pipeline project as other than planned deceit to burnish his image, at the same time attempt to silence his environmentalist critics, and fend off opposition to further contamination of the atmosphere.

Obama's record on climate control (like so much else in the 2008 campaign, he made promises about taking strong action on the environment, yet did not introduce plans to use the EPA to limit greenhouse gas emissions from existing power plants until mid-2014) is inseparable from his larger treatment of corporations, as in making the security and profitability of US business near-absolute under the provisions of the Trans-Pacific Partnership. There are no soft spots in his economic policy; the welfare of major industrial-financial enterprises is possibly second to, and even then interrelated with, militaristic expansion, itself less for its own sake than as the basis for market end investment penetration in an American defined and guided international political system. US multinationals of practically every description are fully intended to operate as vehicles of national power (privatization as the simulacrum of American Exceptionalism) and furnish impetus for the further tightening of the structure of advanced capitalism, in both cases complemented by a strong military underwriting the principle of globalization.

What has this to do with oil, natural gas, coal? Extraction, like consumerism, becomes a god-given right (and rite!) to the superior among individuals, corporations, nations, an instrumental approach to life and statecraft alike which reflects the amoral core of capitalism, the mindset of plunder and take no prisoners. Of course there is concern about energy independence on the level of policymaking, but that hardly explains the lies about the effects of fracking, methane, the turn in strategy to ever more dangerous methods and sources of supply, all pointing to the rapid acceleration of factors promoting climate change. It is as though the nation under Obama intends the outcome, takes pride in self-deception, values denial as an expression of loyalty to capitalism, and ridicules science as faintly socialistic. Only the poor would suffer, marginalized already, and therefore not to be considered. Do I exaggerate? Let's go back to 1950, Theodor Adorno and colleagues, in The Authoritarian Personality, use the f-scale [fascism] to show the unitary character of the human personality structure, the interconnectivity of ideological views when it comes to attitudes toward the individual, society, and government.

Obama cannot obliterate fellow humans through drone assassination and pursue constructive policies on global warming. He cannot pretend to putting in place environmental safeguards when the entire infrastructure of delivery systems (with the lone exception) with the attendant risks ignored has now been constructed, even including ports for the export of oil. What is here lacking is a moral conviction that the affirmation of life requires social justice broadly conceived to apply to nature as well as persons, that respect for one, to be authentic, necessarily entails a respect for the other. By his leadership, fusing Wall Street and militarism, he proves incapable of addressing societal problems, for whether oil or natural gas, the emissions' floodgate is wide- open; pollution goes with consumerism as the genius of American life. Obama is content to go along with the tide, a legacy of spoliation and carnage perhaps altogether fitting for the role the US has set for itself in the world.

NOVEMBER 17, 2015

Matriarchal Fascism: Clinton, Embodiment of US Power

The recent Democratic debate gave a hint of Clinton's pro-Wall Street ingrained posture, frightening because at its foundation is the fusion of militarism and capitalism, both at a heightened stage of development. The harpy of Cold War intervention and regime change, Clinton has used American foreign policy to maximize a US-defined and sponsored pattern of globalization, based on the encirclement, containment, and isolation of both Russia and China, in order to shape a hierarchical domestic structure of retrograde social and economic policies favoring elite financial and industrial groups now popularized as the 1% but in reality a far more complex system because of its militaristic/expansionist underpinnings. When and if fascism comes to America, if it has not already, it will be deceptively clothed: not hardened far right Republicanism, but respectable, seemingly reasonable Liberalism personified by the Clintons with Obama cultivating the intermediate ground.

Who needs Rubio, Cruz, Bush, etc. etc., when Clinton already possesses, better than they, the articulated paradigm of Wall Street, Pentagon, think tank planning and connections which has propelled America's counterrevolutionary role in global affairs, all internalized and ready for execution. I say "matriarchal," then, not to indicate gender per se, but in her concrete case, an overseeing, overarching figure, ready to take command of the full apparatus of power, the new head of the family, using the subterfuge of motherly caring for the disadvantaged and the poor to firm up and tighten a ruling class seeking political-ideological dominance at home and abroad while pursuing traditional imperialist goals of market penetration, a sustained supply of raw materials, the advantages of outsourcing through reliance on a global labor market, and the consequent retardation of Third World modernization and autonomy. Bill Clinton is chimp change compared with what Mrs. Clinton can effectuate under the handle of counterterrorism and neoliberalism: a world open to American spoliation and rapine (including the acceleration of climate change).

Fascism? Yes, in any meaningful sense, beginning with continuing the Obama policies of mass surveillance, indictment of whistleblowers, the use of federal regulatory agencies to protect the interests ostensibly to be regulated, then moving to the principal structural criterion of fascism borne out by Germany, Italy, and Japan (see Barrington Moore's chapter, "Asian Fascism," in his monumental Social Origins of Dictatorship and Democracy): the interpenetration of business and government, an integration of political structure which, even in the absence of the military component, fosters unimpeded capitalist development under the auspices of the State. This winning combination ensures the quelling of dissent over industrial and financial practices and power, habituates the populace to consumerism and patriotism, and employs State worship to cover over capitalistic excesses including the degradation of the environment. Add to the foregoing the undoubted place of the military as a synthesizing force in the political economy and carrying out its objectives, and, indeed, fascism is not a species of name-calling but an accurate description of impending reality.

One cannot but feel that Clinton is the quintessential expression of American tendencies from the late-19th century to the present, from Mahan's free-trade imperialism effected through the battleship navy, to TR's buttressing of corporatism via support for the House of Morgan (along with a severe attitude toward dissent and radicalism), to Wilson's internationalism as preview to the comprehensive framework of globalization (as symbolized in the Siberian Intervention and assumptions underlying the League of Nations), to Harding-Coolidge-Hoover straightout favoritism toward American business at home and abroad (which Clinton conveniently tucks away from view), to the mixed legacy of the New Deal, where authentic reform directed to the social welfare of the bottom-half in the throes of the Depression is partly counterbalanced by the National Recovery Administration's active fostering of monopoly power and wealth concentration, to the postwar period until the present, an unrelieved landscape of business growth harnessed to market expansion and military intervention, all—except for New Deal welfare measures—feeding into Clinton's assertive brand of militarized capitalism, a process sufficiently far along as to establish boundaries, political, ideological, economic, difficult to navigate through, much less counter and ultimately transcend, unless and until what we term the political class overthrows haute-capitalist influence and rejects America's hegemonic goals.

Surprisingly, the New York Times's editorial, "Hillary Clinton Botches Wall Street Questions," (Nov. 16), raises critical points on her debate performance which cast doubt on her suitability to be president. All will soon be forgiven, but this minor outburst perhaps signals wider concern in the electorate over the state of the economy and America's global position of intervention. The editorial in fact approves of her foreign policy credentials, the blip on Wall Street unfortunately a diversion: "Friday's terrorist attacks in Paris dominated [the debate] at first, allowing her to highlight her superior experience in world affairs. But it was those attacks that made her badly muffed response to questions about her fealty to Wall Street all the more jarring." It quotes the exchange between Sanders and Clinton, in which Sanders says, in substance, that Wall Street contributions to Clinton's campaign ("They expect to get something. Everybody knows that") will influence her policies, to which she replied, with injured pride, to the moderator, “Wait a minute, he has basically used his answer to impugn my integrity.”

To its credit, The Times is not blind-sided. When Clinton went on to explain, “So, I represented New York, and I represented New York on 9/11 when we were attacked. Where were we attacked? We were attacked in downtown Manhattan where Wall Street is. I did spend a whole lot of time and effort helping them to rebuild. That was good for New York. It was good for the economy and it was a way to rebuke the terrorists who attacked our country,” The Times acidly observed: “Predictably, Twitter exploded with demands to know what campaign donations from big banks had to do with New York’s recovery from 9/11. Answer: little or nothing.” Rising further to the occasion, the editorial (perhaps unintentionally recalling the earlier slogan, What’s good for GM, is good for the country) lashed out:

Since 2001, she and Bill Clinton have earned more than $125 million for speeches, many of the most lucrative made before financial groups. That does not account for the millions given directly to her campaign, and to political action committees backing her. Nearly 15 years after the 2001 attacks, Mrs. Clinton was earning more than $200,000 for a 20-minute speech. Most of those took place behind guarded doors. But one can guess that she and the financial executives were not still talking about 9/11.

A superb indictment (the guarded doors calling to mind Clinton’s contempt for transparency, as in her evasion about her private email accounts at State) of opportunism, personal enrichment, an above-the-law mental set that manifestly touches on issues of responsibility and integrity.

It gets even better, as though The Times suddenly had pangs of conscience: “Middle-class Americans associate Wall Street with the 2008 meltdown of the economy that cost so many their homes and savings. In the debate Mrs. Clinton repeatedly referred to her plan for reining in banks, but offered few specifics. This is what happens when Hillary Clinton the candidate gets complacent.” However, it’s not clear whether the criticism is directed to her complacency or to the substance of her argument. (At least Sanders wants the restoration of Glass-Steagall, the separation of investment and commercial banking, which she pooh-poohed as inadequate without offering an alternative.) The editorial continues, “Her effort to tug on Americans’ heartstrings instead of explaining her Wall Street ties—on a day that the scars of 9/11 were exposed anew [the Paris attacks]—was at best botched rhetoric. At worst it was the type of cynical move that Mrs. Clinton would have condemned in Republicans.” Yet all is not lost, The Times finding the situation perfectly salvageable: “She should make a fast, thorough effort to explain herself by providing a detailed plan for how she would promote measures protecting middle-class Americans from another financial crisis.”

My New York Times Comment on the editorial, same date, follows:

...the type of cynical moves” says it all. The Times is to be congratulated for its frankness. No doubt it still will endorse Clinton, which is doubly unfortunate knowing how much she and Bill are sponging off Wall Street and leading the sophisticated charge for upper-groups’ aggrandizement. Throughout her career she has presented herself as moderately Left while pursuing an agenda favorable to existing wealth and power. Add to that an extreme hawkish foreign policy, which she has amply demonstrated, and one finds her at bottom not distinguishable from her more vociferous Republican rivals. 2016 will be a sad time in US history, both major parties locked in a consensus on war, intervention, and regime change. (This does not make Sanders any the more appealing, for his foreign policy is equally interventionist and warlike.)

NOVEMBER 20, 2015

Obama, Interventionist: Study of a War Criminal

War criminals are not born, they are made, or rather make themselves through the experience of having an inner motif of self-promotion directed to cultivating, and thus bringing themselves to the attention of, those possessing wealth and power. No subtlety here, no shame of wanting recognition; instead, merely an active fantasy life of grand leadership as a presumed visionary entitled to inordinate deference and respect. Merited achievement is irrelevant and beside the point, for what matters is to ride the wave of organized power, command at one's fingertips, an institutionalized militarism inseparable from the person himself/herself. Such presence, if it is to convince others, requires serial acts of violence sanctioned by law and government: Le State, c'est moi, i.e., once one has arrived, one then becomes the titular head (titular because serving to front a hierarchical system) of an elitist framework composed of the financial, industrial, and military communities, an integrated system disconnected from, while manipulating, the people to ensure social discipline at home and market expansion, via the threat and/or use of force, abroad. This describes the criminalization of historical development and public policy, or to be exact, the context and mental-set of the war criminal, for war is a useful tool for engineering conformity, promoting deference and submission to ruling groups, and diverting attention from social problems at home, and criminal, because the Leader is obsessed with maintaining order and identifying enemies of the State, in this case, primarily the business system as the directing force of State and society alike. Expand or deliquesce, dissolve in a puddle of weakness. This requires placing advanced capitalism on a sustainable basis, militarism becoming the midwife of profitability and expansion.

Sound familiar? It should. We've had decades of it in America, Obama being the latest in a line of specifically fascist-inclined leaders-administrations-Congresses beginning with Reagan, those coming before, especially Kennedy, reaching toward that destination yet not quite crossing the threshold. Before 1960, anticommunism/McCarthyism had already eroded the foundations of civil liberties, democratic government, peace as the approach to international politics, so that with Obama we not surprisingly see the archetypal servitor of a militarized plutocracy familiar in the annals of demagoguery now made presentable, however, as off-beat hip-fascism in the form of more casual deeds of violence, as in drone assassination. The apparatus of the State is kept seemingly in the background to conduct, before and still today (if not more than ever), its course of intervention, regime change, covert action, death squads whether in mufti or uniform as normal procedure in facing out into the world. How Kennedy would have admired Obama's achievements, both sharing a sangfroid which served to popularize an ethos of combativeness, supported by the steady drumbeat of the MSM, that extended well beyond what was dreamed of in the 1960s: then, Russia primarily if not exclusively in the crosshairs, now China perceived as the more consequential adversary, Obama leapfrogging his predecessors including Kennedy in broadening the battleground of confrontation.

This brings us to Syria, perhaps a blip on the radar screen of US global hegemonic thirst, still though instructive and illustrative of the larger picture, a globalization of American-sponsored counterrevolution, in which surgically picking out strategic areas that create an atmosphere of showdown has the desired effect of validating America's Great Power Status. Russia and China will do, but first, clear out the political-ideological debris which then places maximum pressure on the projected enemies—the Middle East an obvious cauldron of mayhem capable of being steered, under proper guidance, into a wider conflict as conceived by the politically criminal mind. To wit: Obama has charged Assad with the genocide of his own people, the use of sarin gas on a civilian population, an utterly despicable act justifying humanitarian intervention by the US, which happens also to deal a blow to Assad's chief allies, Russia and Iran. If nothing else, and there is more, as in, once wiping out Assad, running pipe lines for oil and natural gas through Syria and thereby blocking Russia's exports to the European market, the pretext for intervening in Syria strengthens US ties with Saudi Arabia and Israel (both, for different reasons, fearful of Assad's secularism, and silently cooperating among themselves) and makes of Syria itself the fulcrum for a geopolitical strategy having the potential for inaugurating World War III.

Only, what if Assad did not use sarin gas on his people and the evidence is now being shown to have been shaky, contrived, a false flag operation to offer that very pretext for regime change? When one's amoral cynicism allows for drone assassination, massive surveillance, black holes, as in Obama's signature usage, anything quite frankly is possible, and one believes him with the same degree of confidence one does a snake-oil salesman at carnival time. Here I lay out some evidence and analysis that suggest the preordained conventional wisdom of officials, starting with Obama, designed to disguise America's aggressive intent, is at best questionable and more likely deceitful. For an overview, I turn first to Eric Zuesse's Strategic Culture Foundation article, "Seymour Hersh's News Report Banned in U.S., is Finally Confirmed in Turkey," (Oct. 30), which is a significant defense of Hersh (for my generation, a very fine investigative journalist) who in the London Review of Books exploded the Obama rationale for intervention and regime change in Syria. We will look at Hersh's article after, but context is important, primarily the informal censorship of views which contradict the US position.

Zuesse quotes liberally from Hersh, which we can safely pass over until we come to Hersh, but he points out that the attack on Ghouta, Syria, August 21, 2013, had a strong Turkish-Saudi-US footprint, as revealed October 21 of that year by a Turkish parliamentary committee report and published the same day in Turkey's leading newspaper, Zaman, the object being, as brought out by the opposition party, a concerted effort by Prime Minister Erdogan to overthrow Assad via a false flag attack that would give Obama "a publicly believable excuse for invading Syria and doing what Erdogan wanted done." (Zuesse) The US Joint Chiefs of Staff were in on this, until evidence showed that, through British intelligence, the sarin gas used did not come from the Syrian stockpile, at which point the Chiefs urged caution. Obama, fearing exposure, did not get to bomb Syria to smithereens. CRP, the opposition party in Turkey, charged the government misled the public, deputy Seker stating, "The purpose [of the lie] was to create the perception that 'Assad killed his people with sarin and that requires a US military intervention in Syria,'" the official line that Russia supplied the sarin adding flame to the fire because Russia "is a country that both Erdogan and Obama want to defeat." Secker added, as quoted in Zaman, that "all of the files and evidence from the investigation show a war crime was committed within the borders of the Turkish Republic." In his words, "The investigation clearly indicates that those people who smuggled the chemicals required to procure sarin faced no difficulties, proving that Turkish intelligence was aware of their activities. While these people had to be in prison for their illegal acts, not a single person is in jail. Former prime ministers and the interior minister should be held accountable for their negligence in the incident.”

Ban Ki Moon in late August launched an inquiry into the attack, and Hersh jumped into the fray, seeing the collaboration of Turkey and Syrian rebel groups (for which the US provided aid) as “trying to provoke a US intervention in Syria in order to bring down the Assad regime.” Zuesse also summarizes an article by Christof Lehmann, to whom we turn next, for extensive coverage of the false flag operation, in which Obama, the Joint Chiefs, and the CIA are involved, “the anti-Russian forces (headed by Obama),” according to Zuesse, “[being] behind it,” joined by Prince Bandar and the Saudi Interior Ministry. Zuesse concludes, “All of the evidence indicates that U.S. President Obama and Turkey’s President Erdogan were working together to create a case for America to bomb Syria until Syria’s President Bashar al-Assad would be gone, so that Assad’s government [his secularism, mine] could then be replaced by a Sunni Islamist regime (like Erdogan wants), which would be hostile to Russia and which would thus enable in Syria the construction of pipelines so that gas from U.S.-allied Sunni Qatar and oil from U.S.-allied Sunni Saudi Arabia might take the place of Russia’s oil and gas in the world’s biggest energy market: Europe. It’s a joint operation both of the U.S. aristocracy, and the Sunni Arabic royal families, basically a U.S.-Wahhabist operation.” Some of the “extra billions” being raked in, “would then fund yet more Sunni jihadists and clerics, to spread the Wahhabist Sunni faith yet further and thus satisfy the Sunni clerics and not only the national Sunni aristocracy; but, to Obama, this would mainly be just another way TO CRIPPLE THE RUSSIAN ECONOMY (emphasis, mine), to bring it down, which America’s aristocrats want to do.” The cherry on top of the whipped cream: “Syria’s overthrow would be a fitting sequel to Obama’s February 2014 overthrow of Ukraine’s President Viktor Yanukovich, who, like Bashar al-Assad, refused to cooperate with U.S. plans to force Russia’s President Vladimir Putin out of office.”

Further background for this Syrian coup d’etat can be found in Lehmann’s nsnbc publication, “Top US and Saudi Officials responsible for Chemical Weapons in Syria,” (Oct. 7, 2013), which emphasizes the US-Saudi connection as responsible for the gas attack (Turkey isn’t mentioned) employing rebel brigades under Bandar’s direction affiliated with al Qaeda, especially Liwa-al-Islam and Jabhat al-Nusrah, and the pivotal figure Zahran Alloush, who among other things is a chemical weapons expert. (As happened in Afghanistan, when the US supported the Taliban on the ground that it opposed the Soviet attempt to restore the Kabul government, America has a history of creating allies who turn around and become enemies. It is as though America needs here al Qaeda and/or ISIS affiliates to legitimize its own counterterrorism role as leading to the full-blown global counterrevolutionary posture, a humongous arms budget, and social control at home. To flirt with, actually supply money and arms to, jihadists we condemn at every turn, smacks of opportunism, hypocrisy, and a lot worse, as in capitalism’s dependence for survival on what amounts to a war economy at the expense of meeting pressing domestic needs.) The timing of the sarin attack coincides with, if not directly responds to, the Syrian army’s successful campaign to push back the insurgents, 25,000 strong, at the Jobar Entrance, the gateway both to an attack on central Damascus and the route for receiving US and Saudi arms from Jordan.

Assad was winning the Civil War, despite Obama and the MSM's depiction of a weak yet brave opposition fighting for freedom! 25,000 ain't hay, particularly when supplied with advanced weaponry (e.g., Konkurs anti-tank missiles) and trained by US Special Forces, occurring from the jumping off place of Al-Mafraq, the border town in Jordan. Principal action is occurring right at the time of the gas attack, August 20-21: "The [Syrian Arab Army] breakthrough resulted in a collapse of the jihadists defensive positions [near the Jobar Entrance] and to a crushing and decisive strategic defeat of the Jabhat al-Nusrah led brigades." Jobar, as "the sole remaining logistical supply route," was a major loss, cutting off the insurgents from al-Mafraq, where US Intelligence Services also operated, and "frustrated any hope for a successful, large-scale, CIA-US Special Forces-led military campaign against Damascus." It interrupted the road "used for weapons and troop transports from the Israeli occupied Syrian Golan, where Israeli Intelligence and the insurgents, according to an Austrian UNDOF officer, maintain a joint operations room."

We already see ample reason for a false flag operation; the campaign against Assad is going poorly, making American intervention—on humanitarian grounds—all the more imperative. Lehmann observes: "The collapse of the insurgent front prompted the front commanders, most of which worked in liaison to U.S. Special Forces, to deploy an elite force that should prevent the Syrian Army, at all costs, from gaining access to the Jobar Entrance, and from gaining control over the Jobar area. The majority of the insurgent crack forces came from Liwa-al-Islam with some additional troops from Jabhat al-Nusrah." He explains further: "The commanding officer of the elite forces was a Saudi national," Abu Abdul-Moneim, who "had established a cache of weapons, some of which had a tube-like structure, and others which looked like big gas bottles." They were stored in a tunnel in Ghouta (scene of the attack, and an eastern district of Damascus), the tunnel and cache brought to world media attention because Abdul-Moneim's son and "12 other fighters lost their lives there, because they mishandled improvised chemical weapons caused a leak in one of them." (This tells us the chemical weapons were highly toxic, as in sarin—NP)

Zahran Alloush enters now as the one who delivered chemical weapons to Damascus which were "most likely from al-Qaeda's (ISIL) chemical weapons stockpiles in Iraq." Mohammad Javed Zarif, Iran's Foreign Minister, warned Washington in early September (through the Swiss Embassy in Tehran), it turns out repeatedly, that "handmade articles for chemical weapons, including Sarin gas, were being transferred to Syria. The White House failed to respond." Here holding the Jobar Entrance "at any cost" if the military assault on Damascus was to succeed led to the decision by insurgent commanders "to launch a chemical weapons attack to halt the advance of the Syrian Arab Army." This decision had already been in the works by "the political and military opposition and core members of the international alliance" for some time, to take effect in August-September. The use of these weapons, it was thought, "should justify renewed calls for a military intervention. Lehmann summarizes to this point: "The decision to launch the chemical weapon on 21 August was most likely based on two considerations. That the use of chemical weapons was already planned. That the Jobar Entrance should be defended at all costs. The final decision, made by Zahran Alloush, may in fact have been predetermined together with his U.S.-Saudi liaison officers."

Let's be frank; the evidence remains circumstantial. Yet I find it persuasive. As Lehmann notes, "Launching a chemical weapons attack would allow the USA, UK and France, to call for military strikes against Syria and to turn the tide." Moreover, "Russian and Syrian intelligence sources described the weapons which were used to attack as rockets which were altered so as to carry chemicals, launched by Liwa-al-Islam. The projectiles were most likely fired from a flatbed.” (The account shows the image of a truck which, after firing a single rocket, was covered up, a modified truck, “designed for launching a single rocket at a painfully slow rate of fire—not for tactical purposes.” It was, “literally, the perfect vehicle for a false-flag attack” like the one on Ghouta.) More basic, “one merely has to answer the fundamental question ‘Who benefits,’ and the answer is definitely not ‘the Syrian government.’” He further points out that the BND, the Federal German Intelligence Service, intercepted phone calls between Syrian officers and the High Command, and was convinced “none of the Syrian forces have used a chemical weapon.” In commonsense terms, which should count for something, he states: “Leaving alone any moral considerations, the domestic and international repercussions were foreseeable and there would not have been any strategic benefit for the Syrian Army or the government.”

Remember, Zahran Alloush was the supreme leader of Liwa-al-Islam, commanded its chemical weapons specialists, worked since the 1980s with “then Saudi Intelligence Chief Prince Turki al-Faisal in both Afghanistan and Yemen,” and in the ‘90s “was involved in the Salafist-Wahabbist terrorist networks in Syria which led to his arrest by Syrian intelligence.” He was released in 2011 under Assad’s general amnesty (big mistake—mine) and immediately began receiving funds and weapons from Saudi intelligence, “which enabled him to establish Liwa-al-Islam as a de facto Saudi Arabia sponsored mercenary brigade under the auspices of the Saudi Interior Ministry.” The Ministry also deployed other al-Qaeda brigades in Syria, including the Omar Brigade, which “specialized in high level assassinations and large scale bombings.” Liwa-al-Islam, through Saudi funding, “gained fame due to risky, high-profile attacks, as in a 2012 bombing of Syria’s National Security Council in Damascus’s Rawda Square,” and assassinations of “several high profile members of Syria’s security establishment.” If this group traces back to Prince Bandar, as it does, that suggests a close connection with Washington.

Circumstantial, yes, but Assad’s engaging in sarin attacks on the Syrian people appears more dubious by the hour. A final point: Just weeks before the attack Bandar went to Moscow to meet with Putin, his purpose, to enlist Russia’s support for the removal of Assad. He cajoled, to no effect, then threatened, hinting to Putin that, a political settlement not forthcoming, there is no choice but military intervention. For Lehmann, “The minutes of the meeting clearly suggest Bandar’s direct involvement with regards to political responsibility [for the sarin attack], and Bandar also implies political responsibility of top-U.S. Officials.” They met on August 2; “Bandar tried to bribe Putin with weapons and oil deals in order to gain the Russian President’s support for ousting the Assad government,” to be replaced “with the Saudi-backed and sponsored opposition.” If Russia supported regime change, Bandar promised to reign in Chechen terrorists and protect the Sochi Winter Olympics. Otherwise, the veiled threat. “Putin responded by saying that the Russians know that the Saudis have supported Chechen terrorist groups for a decade, and the support which Bandar just had offered was utterly incompatible with the common objectives of fighting global terrorism.” Bandar was adamant that Assad must go, while Putin “stressed that the Russian position is that the Syrian people are best to speak for themselves, rather than those liver eaters” [the reference to an al-Qaeda leader “who had cannibalized the liver of a slain Syrian soldier”].

Bandar threatened once more: should the dispute over the future of Syria continue, “there is no escape from the (U.S.-led) military option, because the political stalemate would leave the military option as the only available choice to end the stalemate”—this, three weeks before the chemical attacks. Bandar's statement, Lehmann writes, "strongly suggests foreknowledge, and given the close relations between Bandar and the U.S. Director of Central Intelligence, John Brennan, one must imply that top-level White House executives, including President Obama[,] have been briefed and have the same foreknowledge." In Moscow, Bandar said "his message had been coordinated with the highest authorities in the Obama administration": "I have spoken with the Americans before the visit, and they pledged to commit to any understandings that we may reach, especially if we agree on the approach to the Syria issue." By coincidence, Martin Dempsey, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, visits Jordan in mid-August "against the backdrop of major weapons deliveries to the Syrian opposition," this when a month earlier he said to the Senate Armed Services Committee that the administration "is preparing various scenarios for a possible U.S. Military intervention in Syria, and considering whether the USA should use 'the brute [force] of the U.S. Military, and kinetic strikes.'" On August 17, insurgents suffer a major defeat. Four days later, sarin-laden rockets hit Ghouta. The Bandar-Dempsey missions imply a full-court press, the International Criminal Court to this day unwilling to tackle the case. Circumstantial? Our man in the White House would be a prime candidate, along with Bandar and others, for investigation.

I have not forgotten Seymour Hersh—nor should David Remnick (he of impeccable anti-Russian credentials) and the New Yorker staff. His London Review of Books (we marginalize our best critics) article, "The Red Line and the Rat Line: Seymour M. Hersh on Obama, Erdogan, and the Syrian Rebels," (April 17, 2014), while discounting any involvement by Assad in the sarin attack (he does not even dignify the charge by discussing it), shifts the focus of responsibility for it to Erdogan and Turkey, Obama and Washington, along with Saudi Arabia and Bandar, complicit in the planning and execution, all for the purpose of affording the US justification for intervention, each of the participants having their own reasons. If one were to say that Obama had rushed to judgment about Assad the perpetrator of the sarin attack, that would be too charitable; Obama had preconceived ideas to push, knowingly lying to the American and world public by distorting the facts accordingly. We see in this account that inconceivable as it may sound the Joint Chiefs were to the Left of Obama, rejecting claims of Assad's involvement and urging caution on the president about making charges and also planning large-scale bombing immediately afterward.

Hersh goes back to Obama's 2011 Libyan intervention, in which he did not consult Congress, and by contrast, he changed course on Syria, alleging Assad's role in Ghouta and stating "he was ready to launch an air strike" to punish Syria for "crossing the 'red line' he had set in 2012 on the use of chemical weapons," yet failed to follow through. Hersh asks, Why? Two days before the air strike, Obama "announced that he would seek congressional approval for the intervention," and, in contrast to Libya, postponed then called it off when Assad, under Russian brokering of a deal, agreed to dismantle the stock of chemical weapons. The reason for the change: administration people wanting the red line enforced, and "military leaders who thought that going to war was both unjustified and potentially disastrous," a clash of views prompted by the report of Porton Down, Britain's defense laboratory, which had "obtained a sample of the sarin used in the 21 August attack and analysis demonstrated that the gas used didn't match the batches known to exist in the Syrian army's chemical weapons arsenal." That is an important finding, exonerative for Assad, damning for Obama, who maintained Assad's culpability and wanted to bomb Syria into hell.

It does not speak well for Obama that he is to the Right of his military, which buttresses my idea of his war criminality, as can be gleaned from this mildly stated passage: "The message that the case against Syria wouldn't hold up was quickly relayed to the US joint chiefs of staff. The British report heightened doubts inside the Pentagon; the joint chiefs were already preparing to warn Obama that his plans for a far-reaching bomb and missile attack on Syria's infrastructure could lead to a wider war in the Middle East. As a consequence the American officers delivered a last-minute caution to the president, which, in their view, eventually led to his cancelling the attack." Absent the warning, he would have been back to business as usual, collateral damage his middle name and creating oppositional forces—which he is still doing, along with collateral damage—to foster regime change. The Middle East setting, in its incomprehensible network of alliances (our ally and NATO member, Erdogan was supporting the al-Nusra Front, jihadist to the core), provided both the opportunity for causing mischief and falling on our faces when the plans for intervention failed to work out. "For months," Hersh writes, "there had been some acute concern among senior military leaders and the intelligence community about the role in the war of Syria's neighbors, especially Turkey." As one former intelligence official told him, apropos of Turkey's intent to involve American power in the civil war, "We knew there were some in the Turkish government who believed they could get Assad's nuts in a vice by dabbling with a sarin attack inside Syria—and forcing Obama to make good on his red line threat."

Indeed, the manufacture of sarin gas seemed to define the aspirations of these insurgent (al-Qaeda) groups: "The joint chiefs also knew that the Obama administration's public claims that only the Syrian army had access to sarin were wrong. The American and British intelligence communities had been aware since the spring of 2013 that some rebel units in Syria were developing chemical weapons. On 20 June analysts for the US Defense Intelligence Agency issued a highly classified five-page 'talking points' briefing for the DIA's deputy director, David Shedd, which stated that al-Nusra maintained a sarin production cell." The report itself went on, in proper jargonese: "Previous IC focus had been almost entirely on Syrian CW stockpiles; now we see ANF attempting to make its own CW.... Al-Nusrah Front's relative freedom of operation within Syria leads us to assess the group's CW aspirations will be difficult to disrupt in the future." And then, drawing on multiple classified reports, it said: "Turkey and Saudi-based chemical facilitators were attempting to obtain sarin precursors in bulk, tens of kilograms, likely for the anticipated large scale production effort in Syria." The more evidence from the horse's mouth, the less credible Obama's charge of Assad's poisoning his people.

When members of al-Nusra were arrested in Turkey for possessing "two kilograms of sarin," they were quickly released (in addition, they were "accused of attempting to purchase fuses, piping for the construction of mortars, and chemical precursors for sarin") to the consternation of some Turkish papers, which have "been rife with speculation that the Erdogan administration has been covering up the extent of its involvement with the rebels." The DIA classified paper described how one al-Nusra member, working at a Turkish firm, provided "price quotes for bulk quantities of sarin precursors." In fact, the rebels mounted a series of chemical weapon attacks in March-April 2013 which was investigated by a special UN mission to Syria. It found in one village, Khan Al-Assal, that "at least 19 civilians and one Syrian soldier were among the fatalities." But the UN would not assign responsibility for the attack, stating in its report, "Investigators interviewed the people who were there, including the doctors who treated the victims. It was clear that the rebels used the gas. It did not come out in public because no one wanted to know."

The DIA also circulated a daily classified report called SYRUP which dealt with the Syrian conflict (including intelligence on chemical weapons) that soon Denis McDonough, White House chief of staff, abruptly curtailed. Hersh notes, “The decision to restrict distribution was made as the joint chiefs ordered intensive contingency planning for a possible ground invasion of Syria,” and as much internal discussion went on about Obama’s red line: “The joint chiefs asked the White House, ‘What does red line mean? How does that translate into military orders? Troops on the ground? Massive strike? Limited strike?’ They tasked military intelligence to study how we could carry out the threat. They learned nothing more about the president’s reasoning.” The secretiveness is characteristic of his style, and one can assume the worst from his silence. Not unrelated to this, Hersh continues (war criminality still before us): “In the aftermath of the 21 August attack Obama ordered the Pentagon to draw up targets for bombing. Early in the process, the former intelligence official said, “the White house rejected 35 target sets provided by the joint chiefs of staff as being insufficiently ‘painful’ to the Assad regime. The original targets included only military sites and nothing by way of civilian infrastructure. Under White House pressure, the US attack plan evolved into ‘a monster strike’: two wings of B-52 bombers were shifted to airbases close to Syria, and navy submarines and ships equipped with Tomahawk missiles were deployed. ‘Every day the target list was getting longer.’”

The itemization of death—two-thousand pound bombs, stand-by search-and-rescue teams—is altogether fitting, given Obama’s hit-list, his movement of military “assets” to the Pacific as a warning to China, his closeness to both the military and intelligence communities, so that his personal interest in destroying Assad, just as he would like, Putin and Xi, makes perfect sense. Hersh: “At this stage, Obama’s premise—that only the Syrian army was capable of deploying sarin—was unravelling,” the Porton Down material based on chemical samples from Ghouta pulling the rug from under him (though not given wide public currency). The British message to the joint staff was, “‘We’re being set up here,’” referring to the way the rebel forces claimed Assad had used sarin, and “the press and White House jumped at it. Since it now was sarin, ‘It had to be Assad.’” Curiously it was Dempsey, chairman of the joint chiefs, who was skeptical of Assad’s guilt, and who warned Congress that summer “of the danger of American military involvement in Syria, telling Senate Armed Services “‘there’s a risk that this conflict has become stalemated.’” Even Obama’s decision to go to Congress for approval of the Syrian campaign was pure Machiavellian: Like the Iraq experience, “if the current Congress were to vote to endorse the strike, the White House could again have it both ways—wallop Syria with a massive attack and validate the president’s red line commitment, while also being able to share the blame with Congress if it came out that the Syrian military wasn’t behind the attack.”

The bombing campaign was scratched, but its rationale still governed Washington thinking: “Although the strike plans were shelved, the administration didn’t change its public assessment of the justification for going to war.” We can now move from red line to, as in the subtitle, rat line which, shades of Iran-Contra, meant a switch in tactics: “The full extent of US co-operation with Turkey, Saudi Arabia and Qatar in assisting the rebel opposition in Syria has yet to come to light. The Obama administration has never publicly admitted its role in creating what the CIA calls ‘a rat line,’ a back channel highway into Syria.” Here weapons were funneled “from Libya via southern Turkey and across the Syrian border to the opposition.” Many who received them were jihadists, “some of them affiliated with al-Qaeda.” The remainder of the article takes up the role of Turkey, even touching on Benghazi, where arms shipments from Libya began, with Erdogan using the political liaison with the rebels as a bargaining chip to get America to play a more active role in Syria. Erdogan met with Obama in Washington, insisting that Assad had crossed the red line, and like Bandar with Putin, intimating that Turkey would take its own action. Erdogan did get something: “Obama was still permitting Turkey to continue to exploit a loophole in a presidential executive order prohibiting the export of gold to Iran, part of the US sanctions regime against the country.” This was quite a source of enrichment for Erdogan’s circle.

Yet Erdogan, because the CIA was ending its weapons shipments to the Syrian rebels, was being left “exposed politically and militarily,” giving urgency, according to a briefing paper prepared for Dempsey and Chuck Hagel, to the Turkish “need to do something that would precipitate a US military response [as the rebels fell further behind].” American intelligence analysts, the former intelligence officer stated, believed that “the immediate suspect [for the sarin attack] was the Turks, because they had all the pieces to make it happen.” He continued, “We now know it was covert action planned by Erdogan’s people to push Obama over the red line. They had to escalate to a gas attack in or near Damascus when the UN inspectors [investigating an earlier attack] were there. The deal was to do something spectacular. Our senior military officers have been told by the DIA and other intelligence assets that the sarin was supplied through Turkey—that it could only have gotten there with Turkish support. The Turks also provided the training in producing the sarin and handling it.” Whatever the determination of responsibility for the sarin attack, too much points away from Assad’s involvement, while in Obama’s case, too much points toward obsessive concern over regime change which led him to support rebel forces, fictionalize them as “moderate,” sunder Syria’s connection to Russia and Iran, plant the US military, economic, and political presence solidly in the region, and give vent to the expression of personal greatness.

NOVEMBER 24, 2015

Where Does It End?: Left Political Correctness

The activities of the Black Justice League at Princeton to rid the University of any traces of Woodrow Wilson from its history, identity, and entablature are no doubt meeting with wide acceptance among radicals as the prideful admiration of Black Autonomy and Consciousness, a step toward the further eradication of racism, and a modern-day expression of the spirit of Dr. King. As one who has been through the civil-rights wars of the 1950s-60s, beginning with the seemingly harmless act in 1951 of inviting a black student from Morehouse College in Library Science up to my dorm room to discuss Myrdal’s American Dilemma in the segregated University of Florida (word spread after we walked into the Main Library together and went up to the circulation desk where I handed him the volume), the result, an early evening visit from six or seven drunken members of Kappa Alpha who tried to break down the door of my room—instead filling it with boiling water through the open transom— and lynch me, to Mississippi Freedom Summer in 1964, the preliminaries to Selma in 1965, which I described in my CounterPunch article, “Education of a (Sometime) Radical,” while teaching at Yale, to my banishment from Yale for radical activities to Detroit and Wayne State for numerous protests in the late 1960s, thence to Michigan State where I tried to fuse civil rights and antiwar activities, I quietly/solemnly DISSENT from the current Princeton experience—and expect a chilling response from CP readers and the radical community.

My image of Black radicalism, beyond a supreme love for Dr. King, is Paul Robeson, both men going well beyond racial consciousness for a wider indictment of America, capitalism, and militarism, all of which is lacking in the Princeton protesters, who cannot see beyond an obvious symbol of racism, Woodrow Wilson, and neglect/ are ignorant of Wilson's larger viciousness in international affairs, starting with the League of Nations (matched by his Siberian Intervention), to build the US as a Leader of the "free world," i.e., counterrevolutionary, anticommunist, pro-monopoly capitalist (Federal Reserve System, Federal Trade Commission, War Industries Board, all under his watch), in sum, a principal architect of America as we now know it, seeking unilateral global dominance for its advanced stage of industrial-financial-military capitalism, hovering on the edge, and ready to take the plunge into, out-and-out fascism, whose hallmark is the interpenetration of business and government, an elitist social-cultural formation, at the expense of the nation's working class and poor.

Of this, the Black Justice League is apparently wholly ignorant, content instead to sound off in simplistic political correctness to assuage feelings for slights and injured pride. TS. There's a world out there far uglier than what they are encountering at Princeton, and instituting mandatory sensitivity classes is like asking the Nazi executioners at Belsen-Belsen to say "Please" as they shoved Jews into the ovens. In other words, BJL and especially its white supporters are superficial young people mounting imaginary barricades as, from what I've seen from my own experience with some black leaders obfuscating protest to, consciously or not, shield capitalism and militarism (but NOT Dr. King) as part of courting popularity with a wider audience, on an ego trip haughtily puffing away at their supposed base condition.

Given the prominence of Woodrow Wilson at Princeton, why did they go there in the first place? If they are so mindful of racism, including its symbolism, why not, while still in high school, research their college choices—perhaps even, for the sake of racial purity, choose a Black school? If I may be contumacious, especially as judged by fellow radicals, I would subordinate, indeed, always have subordinated, race to class as the societal foundation for transformative freedom and democracy, and that means, as the object of principled, focused agitation, subordinating racism to the basic confrontation with capitalism itself, the source, ultimately, for racism in the first place. Capitalism = hierarchy + exploitation, regardless of race, the place of Blacks in the Grand Schema merely adding zest, profits, ease, and normalization to the exploitation.

By the logic of the Black Justice League, not only should Blacks at Princeton leave the institution lest their presence signifies complicity with racism, but the same standard should be consistently applied across the board, e.g., Black football players at southern universities such as Ole Miss, Alabama, LSU, Texas, Georgia, etc., schools from day one which were segregated until well into the postwar period, for by attending, let alone playing for, these schools they add to their prestige and indirectly legitimize their past. Ditto, the application of purging the past from all associations which directly or indirectly have or still do justify racism—which takes in practically all of the American experience. Political correctness in any form is pernicious by its negation of class consciousness. (I think Oliver Cromwell Cox, a Black sociologist, recognized this in his seminal work, Race, Caste, and Class. Simply, BJL had best get over its simpering, short-sighted, however sincere, way, and get down to business.) This is not an attack solely on Black protest, for Occupy Wall Street and other manifestations of pseudo-radicalism, do not, despite the latter's title, go directly against war, capitalism, generic exploitation, all of which underlay the political-social-economic dynamics of racism.

I'm disgusted with posturing, while the woods are burning, the rapid descent into political hell of both major parties in America, a president whose objective policies could well touch off the Third World War through his threatening confrontations with China and Russia, as meanwhile kissing the derriere of Wall Street and assorted reactionaries, as in his latest DoD appointment, on the domestic and world scene. Sure, Wilson was a bad guy. But so was John Fitzgerald Kennedy, so was practically every US president (I partially exempt FDR), if not avowedly on civil rights, then on the structural-social context on which racism thrives: a hierarchical system of wealth and power, founded on corporate concentration, an ethic of superiority for those benefiting from such a system, a glorification of war and force, a contempt for those held to be weak and/or inferior. If Black students at Princeton are serious, let them excel in their studies first, last, and always, and then go out into the world to change it for the better—yes, as radicals who perceive the larger picture of oppression and repression. Paul Robeson knew that Blacks will not be free until ALL men and women are free; racial feeling is a device of Capital to split the protesters apart, or to keep them together on carefully sanitized lines, so one takes down entablature while the other applauds. It sounds like Christopher Eisgruber, the president of Princeton, is just such a patsy for giving in to demands of political correctness. I term such a phenomenon, for he is not alone among university presidents, liberal fascism, in this case, placating the disaffected through political cosmetics that bring them back into the consensus. Rather than sensitivity sessions for students and faculty alike, send both out to the slums of America, to the countries that America has devastated and need rebuilding, and challenging the corporations and arms factories sucking the blood out of humanity. For these, too, are part of a good liberal education in the best sense of the phrase, a well-grounded cosmopolitanism not afraid of being a part of radical social change.

Wake up, BJJ and study like never before, to see that Woodrow Wilson is the mere surface of a society which discriminates not only against Blacks, but humanity and Nature all for the sake of filthy lucre and the thrill of conquest. Wake up, all Blacks who possess a passion for freedom (whose historical deprivation makes them uniquely suited for a vanguard role in transforming America, while much of the white working class has succumbed to the blandishments of hate—yes, against Blacks, but all immigrants and those at home who lack the requisite patriotism and martial spirit), many of whom nonetheless forming a core constituency of Hillary, possibly the most dangerous person among the current presidential contenders. I have written recently about the power of saying No—No to the ethnocentrism/xenophobia on which ruling groups thrive and capitalism keeps the population in line by scaring into their arms for protection. At Princeton, instead of a Milque-toast occupation of the president's office, stand firm against military recruiters when they come to campus, or representatives of Morgan, Chase, or the armament crowd, etc. etc., the vultures who feed on all of us, if you want to see the props of racism knocked out. Racism thrives on freezing the status quo; a far nobler task than you are presently involved with, viz., removing a mural, changing the name of a residential college and that of the School for International Affairs, would be to fashion your individual strengths, skills, personal commitment to the democracy of the many, and come out swinging.

NOVEMBER 27, 2015

Syrian “Civil War”?: No, A Proxy War of Global Confrontation

The historical parallel for Syria today is the Spanish Civil War of the late 1930s, a dress rehearsal for the building wider conflict, only now with the key players arranged differently and ideology scrambled to account for these differences. Nazism is no longer a factor, its place assigned to America in mobilizing incipient world forces of fascism to confront a Left alternative to counterrevolution and unrestrained capitalism. There is no Abraham Lincoln Brigade to fight alongside Republican defenders of democratic government. Obama is Franco, regime change the focus shaping Western alignment (US-EU-NATO) to destroy, not Revolution or Communism per se (both practically nonexistent as Russia evolves through significant mixed and capitalist elements far removed from dynamic socialism), but Russia nonetheless in the cross-hairs still, as, along with China, blocking US unilateral world hegemony as the vanguard for a militarized, advanced-capitalist system founded on the purging of Left social-economic movements and governments. The vision is totalitarian: anything that interferes with domination, pure and simple, of the West, the US as its epicenter, with respect to Asia, Latin America, Africa, the Third World as conveniently defined to include whatever lies outside the boundaries of the West, must be kept in check, ultimately retarded in autonomous development, isolated from each other and sanitized to ensure subordination and servility.

Assad is hardly Fidel or Che in the postmodern world, but Syria’s secularism, by breaking the mold of the Middle East, incites America, like the red cape in the bullfighter’s ring, which finds even ISIS more manageable to deal with, because already a part of the geopolitical landscape, than a state model that rejects religion as the basis for social organization. Secularism has the potential for liberation, perhaps democratization as well, while religion, notwithstanding an extremist expression, as in ISIS, supports a generalized status quo compatible with varying shades of repression, Israel and Saudi Arabia, though among themselves nominally different, archetypal expressions of—from the Western geostrategic standpoint—acceptable modes of said repression. The passionate hatred displaced on Assad, when every tinhorn dictator gets a Washington ovation and get-out-of-jail card free no questions asked, rightly should arouse one’s suspicions. Like pre-World War II Spain, Syria has become the global hot spot, as though now, Assad provides the excuse for going head-to-head with Russia, China in the background as the next adversary to be contained, isolated, if possible, subjugated, like Russia, preferably short of global nuclear conflagration. But who knows, capitalist ideology now so ferociously believed and acted on, that even nuclear annihilation can be stumbled into, if not deliberately headed for, as proof positive of systemic moral virtue.

Putin was not originally cut out for democratic world leadership (the KGB does not deserve a free pass), but as the global dynamics of great-powers confrontation take shape and fall into place, he, almost by default, has already assumed that role and increasingly represents a voice of sanity in arresting the surge of Western (US-led) power toward a bi-level world operationally recapitulating past colonialism harnessed to up-to-date multinational market aggrandizement and accompanying financial ground-rules both supported through control over international organization (a domesticated UN or its equivalent) and parallel institutions (IMF, World Bank, and trade-agreement machinery, such as the Trans-Pacific Partnership). This is beginning to look like Lenin’s concept of ultra-imperialism, except that Lenin was no match for our present-day political-military-financial Cold War honchos. I don't know whether Putin and Xi are, but at least they are free of any illusions that the West seeks a genuine accommodation of peaceful relations, rather than take-no-prisoners conquest. The downing of the Russian jet (no, not the bombing of the passenger jet two weeks ago, but the plane two days ago) is a clear harbinger of things to come: provocation piled on provocation, ISIS not thoroughly vanquished, so as to provide an opportunity for further military expansion and internal police tightening in response until a crisis point is reached and events take over.

The plane downing, I sensed before Putin made the charge, had all the earmarks of having been planned in advance, i.e., the contingency provided for via approval of the US and NATO, and not Erdogan's decision to be made alone, specifically for the purpose of preventing the unity of response between Russia and the West in the wake of the Paris massacre. Events move fast, but even Paris or similar attack was not unforeseen, so that EU/US rapprochement with Russia had to be avoided at all cost. Obama, no longer Franco, is perhaps von Ribbentrop, coyly biding time as the knife turns. (Putin was not far from the truth when he said that he and Russia were stabbed in the back.) I have said before, counterterrorism is the cosmitized, dressed-up version of anticommunism, through cultural-ideological lag a still useful weapon against both Russia and China abroad, radicals, dissenters, whistleblowers at home. Syria will find its parallel in the South China Sea, whatever it takes to foster xenophobia and false consciousness as preparatory to an aggressive posture in world affairs.

Putin will not abandon Assad. Xi will not accept economic-military encirclement. If I had my druthers, Russia would cut off oil and natural gas shipments to the West until it conceded that Russia had a right to exist free from the NATO menace at its borders, neo-fascist threats from Ukraine, and terrorist attacks from Chechnya, while China would strengthen its economic role in Asia, Africa, and Latin America, tearing apart the fabric of American hegemony and forcing it to live within its means—the best thing that could ever happen to it if a democratic society is to be achieved. Eight hundred military bases (and still counting) under bipartisan dispensation, with the full consent of the American people, will lead to more soup kitchens, cries of neglect and desperation in the streets, deteriorating standards of health and well-being, on one hand, enveloping monopolism, waste, environmental ruin, habituation to intervention, covert action, and regime change, on the other, all as a recipe for societal disaster and impending war.

NOVEMBER 30, 2015

Israel and ISIS: Needed, a Thorough Accounting

The tangled web of political alignments in the Middle East appears to have obscured possible connections between Israel and ISIS, so opposite in religious belief systems yet sharing a basic geopolitical framework of realpolitik in identifying their respective enemies. The adage of the enemy of my enemy is my friend, though not historically perfect, may apply here, centered on a common purpose of displacing the Assad government in Syria and, to that end, drawing in the US, Saudi Arabia, Turkey, and Qatar to sanctify the marriage of convenience. Israel has been noticeably quiet about mounting opposition to ISIS (ditto, ISIS with respect to Israel), and shares with the anti-Assad coalition clear hostility toward both Iran and Russia, Assad's chief backers. If this were all, circumstantial/conjectural reasons at best, there would be no need to proceed. Yet one is suspicious when it is seen that the Israeli Air Force has been engaged in bombing raids in Syria in support of the Free Syrian Army and the Al Nusra Front against Assad, as part of the pool of opposition. Too, reports have surfaced of Israeli Defense Force personnel joining with ISIS units (revealed with the capture of an IDF colonel by the Iraqi Army) on the Salahuddin front.

The evidence is scattered, although an ominous picture now emerges. One sees assorted rebel forces, backed by the US and others, which have created a Salafist Principality in eastern Syria, ISIS territory today, that poses a direct threat to Assad. Additionally, Hezbollah is fighting on the side of the Syrian Army against ISIS, reason enough for Israel to oppose Iran, Hezbollah's sponsor, and Assad. Here the UN Disengagement and Observer Force (UNDOF) stationed on the Golan Heights between Israel and Syria has reported seeing that Israel has worked closely with the Al Nusra Front. Also suspicious is the US position, which has been to insist on Assad's removal before the fight with ISIS, an embarrassing position because Russia's involvement with pushing back and destroying ISIS has made America turn reluctantly to cooperate with Russia and temporarily deemphasize regime change. Through all of this, we still do not know why the US is so opposed to Assad, except that in fact Syria is seen by American policymakers as a pawn in the larger game, renewal of the Cold War, directed first against Russia, but with China perhaps the primary target once Russia is isolated, weakened, and compelled to accept an international order founded on US-defined and –controlled financial-industrial-commercial organization, with China being the next stop, to the same end, in America's unilateral status as undisputed global leader.

The stakes are high, as they always are when a militarily powerful nation chooses to operate on the falling-domino theory—push on or go under, granted, an opportunistic psychology, but one that justifies each intervention, each covert action, each regime change (all of which is sincerely believed in the exotic ideological cocktail of fusing ethnocentrism and hegemony inscribed in the mental-set of advanced capitalism) as vital to expansion of the developmental process, an underwriting of military supremacy, and full realization of exceptionalism as befits the national destiny. If not Syria, then someplace else, wherever the planets are in alignment for forcing the confrontation, in this case, ideal for the employment of global force, the EU and NATO arrayed solidly at the Russian border, and the longer-term maneuver to encircle and isolate China as America does for Asia what it has already succeeded in doing for Europe, possess the right to unrestrained market-and-investment penetration backed by the military pivot and multiparty trade agreement. TPP carried on the wings of the aircraft carrier battle groups, just as similar arrangements have been activated and enlivened by NATO: the militarization of capitalism as America's solution to the falling (political-economic) domino theory.

But where do Israel and ISIS come into the picture? Israel is America's talisman; it acts like a charm in bringing America into the center of global rivalries, its defense the gold standard for legitimating intervention, not only in the Middle East but preparing the world for America's role as the supreme architect of counterrevolution. Israel, our lucky charm, confirms by our defense of its existence, US omnipotence in world politics, magnified by the fact if any nation does not deserve protection, in light of its record of ethnic cleansing, subjugation of an occupied people and land, and support of regimes having poor human rights records, makes it an international tough sell thus adding to America's prestige as a force to be reckoned with. If Israel did not exist, America would have had to invent it (paraphrase of Sartre), so well does it reproduce in microcosm America's own character traits of arrogance, cynicism, hardness. What then of ISIS? It as well is a blessing to American foreign policy, which is why the US has been halfhearted in its eradication. The more repulsive, as in beheadings, the more salutary from the standpoint of massive surveillance at home, the engineering of a crisis atmosphere (to the sacrifice of civil liberties), the internalization of fear, which shifts the political spectrum still further rightward, as in heightened patriotism, anti-immigrant feelings, a trivialization of politics because so much of public policy is placed off limits. An inane marching in lockstep to consumerism and paralysis on issues that matter, from war to the environment to public health to democratization of the political economy.

ISIS is welcome news for habituating the populace to social control. Foreign policy, however, is the chef d'oeuvre, in the eyes of American policymakers, in regards to usefulness. For the entire enterprise of counterterrorism, from which all things repressive is possible, requires just such a terrifying social menace (not that I underestimate its power, viciousness, and imperative need to be combatted) to be effective, and what we find, rather than a straightforward effort at ISIS's riddance, is instead the selective elimination of whomever we declare to be enemies, under the rubric of counterterrorism (e.g., Assad), keeping pure and undiluted the hegemonic paradigm of greatness. The US creation of ISIS may not have been deliberate, but the invasion of Iraq and the US presence in the Middle East (just as earlier, in Afghanistan, with respect to the Taliban), certainly was a major contributing factor. Once ISIS is finally dislodged, probably through forces other than the US and Israel, there will be others of like character, because the breeding ground of international exploitation will not have ceased. Fanaticism feeds on oppression, something the oppressor is ever loathe to admit.

DECEMBER 3, 2015

Ibsen Today: Wellsprings of a Poisoned Community

No, this is not about the Paris climate summit, although tangentially Barack Obama's empty promises of a progressive legacy, because he is in fact wreaking damage on the Earth we love, the chief despoiler less on climate-related than on political-ideological-military matters (themselves the context for undermining the will to humanize/democratize a respect for Nature, which alone, said respect, can halt the greed, venomous assaultive mind-set) poisoning the wellsprings of earth and polity alike. Paris becomes a solemn farce of self-righteous grandstanding when the US is the chief purveyor of violence in the world, Obama the ideal personification of structural traits and social attitudes breeding wanton disregard for the humility and restraint, yes, the unashamed devotion toward all human dignity and environmental justness together defining a moral universe of societal peace, harmony, abundance. For Henrik Ibsen, Obama and America would have represented the perfect embodiment of a community and its leadership (because Obama is not alone, but only a spokesperson for wealth, power, and their combined militarization in a tightly molded historical construct of advanced capitalism informally directed by elites of these groups in a well-lubricated ruling class) held together by a dark secret, one they did not even admit to themselves, of war, intervention, the promiscuous use of everything from false-flag operations, to regime change, to saturation bombing to—the presumably genteel—economic embargoes, destructive of the lives and welfare of ordinary people, the children the ones who are most vulnerable to sickness and malnourishment, in sum, the dark secret of repressing from thought the self-hatred and nihilism leading to unfathomed aggression eating away at the vitals of the American conscience and consciousness.

Here political economy joins philosophy indicting the closed community found in Ibsen's play, "An Enemy of the People," (1882), which I am updating—without doing disservice to his work—to represent a more modern closure, militarized advanced capitalism (nowhere better noted than in present-day US): a structural-ideological integration in which we see a Nazified "folk-community" cemented together, and paralyzed to act otherwise, through its devotion to the leadership of wealth and power, translated as the reification of public opinion to disguise the hierarchical, class-dominated features of the social order. Admittedly, Ibsen did not follow through to the end the characterization of his hero, Dr. Thomas Stockmann, who, after having discovered that the Baths on which his town depended for its income and prestige had been poisoned by environmental pollution, and then mercilessly pilloried for his efforts to reveal the dirty little secret binding the community, stands up more as a Promethean demigod battling the masses (in subjective thrall to the elite), hence more an Ayn Randian figure, than, instead of condemning the people, a revolutionary defiantly challenging the social structure and the upper groups supporting it. But this, after all, is 1882, and Ibsen cannot see beyond the tyranny of public opinion, which he nonetheless ascribes—to his credit—to the power system itself, and, be it said, a capitalism in microcosm with all of the recognizable features of greed uppermost, class dominance, secretiveness (i.e., lack of transparency) in the operation of the Baths and the profitability to the shareholders, the intimidation from above in the subornation of the town's newspaper, aptly called the "People's Messenger," indeed the silencing of all and sundry to validate the secret.

Ibsen knew his capitalism, despite the early dating, and furthermore, knew his liberalism, which he saw as base, opportunist, waiting for the opportunity to show its true colors, rallying to the side of Authority, even suggesting the corruption of the working class for a plebeian fascism by its complicity in keeping the secret and preventing Dr. Stockmann from being heard. The mob scene toward the end, when he is shouted down in public meeting, brings back vivid memories to me of having similar experiences when addressing antiwar rallies in Detroit in the late 1960s, thanks to CIA-sponsored Breakthrough. Stockmann may be pardoned, I believe, his supreme individualism, because of his selfless, really, sacrificial, actions, its elitism notwithstanding, in his refusal to be intimidated as, rather than being hounded out of the community, he stands his ground about the poisoning (despite efforts to buy him off) and seeks to educate the people, speaking on street-corners, to realize their humanity and overthrow the rotten administration (his own brother, Peter, is mayor, complete with the regalia of hat and stick, arch-protector of the Baths, and chief enforcer of the town's conformity, as well as leader in turning the towns-people against his brother). Unrepentant, facing destitution and total ostracism himself and his family, fired from his position as medical officer of the Baths, his daughter Petra fired from her teaching post, thrown out of their house, window panes smashed the night he attempted to speak (after being denied a public venue), to all of these acts of suppression, the response of so-called public opinion, he now became LIBERATED and for the first time fully comprehended the horror of political-economic-social privilege. This, although Ibsen does not say it, is the start of Dr. Stockmann's education as a radical, whether now, the journey from Ayn Rand to Karl Marx, doesn't really matter, for he already has seen through the complicity of liberalism with totalitarianism, the fragile character of a free press anxious to placate upper groups and, in performing that service, manipulate and bamboozle the public, the rotten foundation on which business civilization rests.

If I may be permitted to interpolate thoughts on the present based on the play, capitalism has maintained its own secrets, layered as though gift-wrapped in sheets of tinsel so as to prevent the understanding of collective self-repression in order to keep up the democratic appearances of, particularly in America's case, equality and freedom, as meanwhile we find that a pattern of global domination continues unabated, ditto the destruction of the environment, and poverty along with the shrinking of the social safety net and the ethos of public responsibility for the general welfare is under assault wherever capitalist "austerity" is practiced. The Baths of Ibsen symbolize the crudity of repression modern capitalism, in full-dress military uniform, practices on, not only the Third World, but the helpless, the victims, at home. Not only America, because America is the world leader of capitalism, and in exercising that leadership (e.g., the IMF under its guidance as really a civilian branch of Special Ops, dedicated to regime change) it fulfills the dream of all capitalist powers dating back to Ibsen's own time: stabilization, order, subjugating the people to docile assent, the broadly conceived paradigm of counterrevolution which keeps the world as a two-tiered formation, call it North and South, it doesn't matter, so long as global exploitation is free to continue. When Dr. Stockmann plants his feet solidly on the ground with the masses, which I sense was what he wanted, rather than standing on their heads, it will be a new ballgame, the working class itself shaking loose from capitalist ideological influence so as to combat all the poisoned Baths surrounding, and created by, us—a new ballgame of social decency and human respect. But not Dr. Stockmann, the individualist, the loner, but multiplied thousands-fold, arising from the people and acting in their name and, more important, on their behalf: on OUR behalf, each person, each tree, each river; for pollution, whether political or physical, poisons the wellsprings of life, history, the future.

DECEMBER 4, 2015

Tyranny of Accommodation: A Paradigm of Speech Control

My generation (or before) used to sing, "Love is sweeping the country," but now a more pernicious force is sweeping America, speech control parading under the guise of liberalism, racial and gender justice, a notch upward of humanism transcending the hatreds and discriminations of the nation's past. Ah, feels so cleansing and good to protest again, proving our democratic mettle, reaching out to those amongst us the most victimized, Blacks and Women, in a political culture awash with consumerism and imperialism. Let the Voices of Oppression be heard once more, a Second Civil Rights Movement, American greatness and dedication to freedoms reaffirmed through the stand-up actions of the hitherto despised and/or neglected. A wondrous, joyful sight, its recent culmination the Black Justice League at Princeton and the protest against the House System at Harvard, Yale, and Princeton, where the term "Master," insidious in its reminders of slavery, is to be replaced by race- and gender-neutral language. Why not here? For university students are in our time the prototypic radicals mounting the barricades on behalf of all of us.

***

This invocation, an appeal to alleviate and rectify the condition of injured sensibilities, is unmitigated pusillanimous nonsense. I have used the imagery before, the woods are burning, by some playwright or other, to indicate and criticize the trivialization of fundamental human suffering at the hands of advanced-capitalism's war machine bent on exclusive global dominance in an age where the remainder of the world is awakening to its dangerous consequences for the Earth's peoples and lands, crops, animals sustaining them. In America especially, we politicize everything so as to deflect attention from the obvious, namely, that over the centuries we have been perfecting the machinery of degradation and exploitation awaiting our own working and lower classes and, by virtue of the dynamics of capitalist expansion, all whom we can bring down from without. In the bad sense, class trumps all else, class here being a still somewhat loosely amalgamated ruling group made up of industrial, financial, and of more recent origin, military, elites, with the so-called political class its mere servitors. Even now, we, as radicals, simplify, with our soothing rhetoric of the 1%, which, spit out suffices to do our thinking for us, rather than the hard analysis about what are the sources of wealth and power in America. A hierarchical structure of class rule cannot be neatly/symbolically summarized as the 1%, particularly where the apparatus of State Power, above all, in foreign policy, penetrates and controls the lives of the entire society. Yes, class rule = repression; class rule = what I have been terming the militarization of capitalism. Class rule is the incubator and enforcer of false consciousness. Class, then, in the bad sense, the harmful, destructive sense, sucking out the lifeblood of the polity in order to facilitate greater wealth concentration, monopolization of economic life and institutions, privatization of thought, conscience, feelings, each and all corruptive of human freedom and leaving in its place a wasteland of alienation and the inauthentic search for meaning.

But then there is class in the good sense, class democratized, class the weapon of human autonomy—and here we come back to the current state of race-and-gender protest in America. Simply, class must trump race and gender if all are to be free. This is neither to erase racial and gender identities nor therefore create a homogeneous mishmash honed into the Great American Synthesis. True diversity is the precious possession of a social order which thrives on variegation as the catalyst to self-expression and collective bursting forth of creativity. I would maintain, then, class trumps race, class trumps gender, not as some irreducible, irresistible Marxian force of supra-identity, but as recognizing there are greater problems in the world than the gratification of self-identity and ego-fulfillment. Large numbers of people starve every night. Large numbers of people die prematurely, even in infancy, due to lack of clean water, proper sanitation, necessary medicines. AND large numbers of people die, violently, agonizingly, from saturation bombings, drone assassinations, the steady application of force which topples elected governments and raises dictatorial regimes. Death has been inscribed in public policy for some time, no flinching, perhaps even ghoulish delight on the part of the business-political-military elite, all in the name of preserving the American Way of Life. At home, not much better conditions obtain, a rancid public opinion—often composed of those most victimized, as a species of plebeian fascism now seemingly preponderant in political life—yet, as the obfuscation of class interest, the poor mired down in seeming apathy as unemployment continues apace, welfare provisions originating with the New Deal dismantled brick by brick, regulation of banking and industry a travesty of justice, a society beginning to come apart at the seams. To paraphrase Brecht’s “Arturo Ui,” yesterday Colorado Springs, today San Bernardino, tomorrow the World.

***

Let’s turn to the present wave of discontent, the injured sensibilities of Blacks and Women in our colleges and universities, who, if they unflinchingly broke through their solipsistic selves and looked about them at the political-structural-ideological depravity of the country’s ruling groups crushing the spirit and destroying the life-chances of those below them in the social structure and labor force (and doing still greater damage to those satisfying their military-economic-financial agenda abroad), perhaps might recognize the pathetic nature of their complaints, compared to the suffering of others, including of course overwhelming numbers of Blacks and Women themselves, because of name-calling and veiled references (like College “Masters” at Yale). I am not concerned with labelling the students, pampered, spoiled, etc., but I am, when it comes to self-indulgence precisely in the face of the tangible militarism, injustice, and exploitation to which they avert their gaze and studiously ignore. Their protest is hollow, easily met by cowardly administrations wanting to be loved and seen in the best light by their equally politically correct academic peers. Correct a derogatory word, but don’t challenge corporate power, the grinding war machine, imperialistic hubris—on which students, faculty, administrators, alike, are silent. The present student protest is fool’s gold, a lame excuse for accommodating to the reigning power. The woods are burning, and the affected groups are pissing on the fire, their mentors serving up lemonade to keep the stream flowing. How many of the protesters, upon graduation, and for many, further professional training, will join the ranks of the oppressors, Uncle Toms to Morgan, Chase or the Joint Chiefs of Staff, or better yet, for which Yale is famously known, the ranks of the CIA, we’ll have to see. They already have a useful role model in Barack Obama, who in consequential ways has already sold out Blacks and all whom his policies have injured through his attention to war, intervention, a military budget designedly bleeding the ameliorative sectors so desperately in need of support, and his lavish care of Wall Street. Criticism of Obama, or for Women, Hillary, hardly. It’s much easier to go after the wife of the Master of Silliman College, Yale, of which I was a Fellow for three years. (Oops, the word “Fellow” is pejorative, and will have to be vacuumed out of mind, if the students at Yale and elsewhere put their shoulder to the wheel and compile a list of offending words.)

It was not always thus. I marched proudly with Dr. King on several memorable occasions, and once at the suppression of SNCC workers and others in Montgomery in the days leading up to the Selma March, I looked directly into his eyes from a foot away and could see even then this giant of a man living with the fear of assassination. Dr. King did not make the mistake of our college youth today. He knew where the sources of injustice lay, in militarism and capitalism, with racism the product not the cause of Black un-freedom. At the height of his powers he advocated for peace through his protest against the Vietnam War, and he advocated for class in his Poor People’s Campaign, the latter actually leading to his assassination. We forget. We spout names in seeming reverence and then undo the splendid, hard work of a meaningful consciousness of freedom by magnifying slights as though they were the equivalent of barbaric acts of lynching. Blacks and Women have been knocked down, actually and metaphorically spit upon, subject to the raw ugliness of intolerance, ignorance, bigotry, and today, there is still abuse daily evident, but the choice, the challenge, remains—cosmetic or systemic as the focus of protest and social change? A random look at examples over the last several weeks—a far cry from the ruthless police murders of Black teenagers all too apparent (ruthless murders abroad, with impunity, why not at home, for repression feeds on itself, especially when instanced and legitimated from on high, and is of one cloth)—will bear out my point, the contrast between unmitigated authoritarian/militaristic capitalist behavior and expansion on one hand, the campus movement of correct speech on the other.

Here is Nick Anderson and Susan Svrluga’s article in the Washington Post, “Can colleges protect free speech while also curbing voices of hate?”, (November 10), in which they first dance around the issue of free versus hateful speech, quoting university officers who themselves jive-talk the issue, as does Wallace Loh, president of the University of Maryland: “We have a responsibility to advance the values that define a community. We have to take affirmative steps in education and outreach before these incidents happen.” My reading between the lines—chalk one up for speech control, as a student who sent a “racist, sexist e-mail” to his frat members was called aside by Loh, asked to apologize and voluntarily left school for the semester, Loh asking “the community to forgive the student and start a dialogue to improve the campus climate in College Park.” The reporters, presumably approving this liberal comforting sentiment, nonetheless, citing an Atlantic article entitled “Coddling the American Mind,” point to the alternative view: “Schools nationwide, public and private, have grappled recently with controversies about speech and expression. Some critics wonder whether colleges have become too politically correct, obsessed with preventing ‘micro-aggressions’ and promoting ‘trigger warnings’ and ‘safe spaces.’”

Not so lucky as the Maryland student was Steven Salaita, his job offer rescinded by the University of Illinois “after critics took offense at the tone of comments he made about Israel on Twitter.” (The more cases I read about, the more fortunate I feel about retirement from the academic world, although in truth I still would have relished a good fight.) Then there was Williams College, its student club, Uncomfortable Learning, having invited Suzanne Venker, an outspoken opponent of feminism, to which students objected. “Reaction was so intense,” write the reporters, “that students canceled the event, concerned for her safety. A student then reinvited her, but she declined.” Chalk up another one for speech control. At Wesleyan—frankly I expect better from Williams and Wesleyan, which in former days had outstanding radicals and dissidents on their faculties—the student paper, the Wesleyan Argus, “faced a sharp backlash in September after publishing an opinion piece critical of the tactics of the Black Lives Matter movement. The student government later took steps toward cutting the newspaper’s budget for next year.” Yale, however, deserves the spotlight for leading the charge for correct speech. Two mortal incidents guaranteed to shake the very heavens: first, “fraternity brothers turned black women away from a party, saying, ‘White girls only,’ a claim the fraternity’s president has denied. The university is investigating the incident.” (Disclosure: self-respecting women, regardless of race, had best stay away from these fraternity parties, at least as I recall an earlier day.) Second, the wife of Silliman College’s master, Erika Christakis (bless her!) “wrote an e-mail raising questions about a message from school officials that urged students to consider whether their Halloween costumes might offend someone by stereotyping a culture or race.”

Halloween costumes, while America has 800 military bases around the world, its DoD buzzing with geostrategic plans and operations threatening global confrontations, gun violence run amuck at home, businesses merging and consolidating at unprecedented rate, presidential politics reduced to a proto-fascistic base line, while the president himself is busily occupied with regime change and covert actions—Halloween costumes? Somebody, both students and administrators alike with their screw-ball prioritizing; she and her husband offered to debate the matter, but “their comparisons to debates about free speech and ‘trigger warnings’ only made students angrier.” Now, more briefly, to Yanan Wang’s article, “Harvard College ‘House Masters’ to get new titles because of slavery connotation,” also in the Washington Post, (December 2), in which the reporter explains: “Ivy League institutions adopted the term from British Schools, notably Oxford and Cambridge, where ‘master’ survives as a shorthand for ‘schoolmaster’ or ‘headmaster.’ But in the American context, the ‘Master’ moniker, which is also used at Yale and—until very recently—Princeton, has been criticized for its associations with slavery. Students and faculty alike have pointed out the title’s unsettling historical connotations. Its elimination has figured among demands from student protesters at Harvard and Yale. And now it’s becoming clear that the hoary title is on its way out.” I guess I'm too old, and the gesture quite utterly futile, to give back my Harvard doctorate, but again sounding nostalgic, Harvard was not like that years ago. We were, in addition to our studies, too busy picketing every Friday afternoon against nuclear testing and Saturday noon picketing in the Square Woolworth's for lunch-counter desegregation in the South—that in addition to working under professors of all political and ideological persuasions, or none at all.

Nuff said. Rather than give a full account of what is transpiring on this issue at Harvard, I close with this terse statement, “Harvard College Dean Rakesh Khurana announced in an email to students Tuesday night [Dec. 1] that leaders of the university’s undergraduate residences have agreed to forego the title of ‘Master,’” now followed by his statement: “I write on behalf of myself and my fellow residential House leaders [he could not bring himself to say, House master, in an earlier interview stating he has “not felt comfortable personally with the title”] to let you know that the House Masters have unanimously expressed desire to change their title. In the coming weeks, the College will launch a process in which members of the House leaders’ docket committee, working with senior College team members and the House leadership community as a whole, will suggest a new title that reflects the current realities of the role.” The decision, he added, if “current realities of the role” did not already say enough, approved by Harvard president, Drew Faust, “has taken place over time and has been a thoughtful one, rooted in a broad effort to ensure that the College’s rhetoric, expectations, and practices around our historically unique roles reflects and serves the 21st century needs of residential student life.” A process meticulously described with all of the care of an Eichmann. Orwell, tennis anyone?—as those of us so inclined retreat to our dormitories, classrooms, and offices, and perhaps sulk, while the rest of us continue the fight, the same fight for social justice, sans concerns about Halloween costumes, and oppose war, vicious wealth distribution, the cunning mind-set that gives us massive surveillance, a titillating consumerism, and essentially the evisceration of both nature and humanity.

DECEMBER 7, 2015

Evolving Geopolitical Economic Framework: US vs. China

The Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank is a game changer in what had been since World War II and Bretton Woods American global financial dominance in facilitating US unilateral market penetration via the preponderant voice in IMF and World Bank operations and policy making, and, equally significant, integrating expanding economic power with an interventionist military underpinning. Thus far, America has had it its own way both in the politicization of the world structure (e.g., the Marshall Plan as an early initiative in precipitating the First Cold War, and carried forward into the Second with the fusion of the EU and NATO) and, within the US, the militarization of capitalism as the crucial developmental process (an advanced-capitalist system reaching apogean maturity) sustaining its further growth. No longer. There is a new kid on the block challenging this pattern of hegemonic globalization, yes, relatively speaking, “kid,” having the vitality, growth potential, AND capacity for alternative planning, thinking, and organization, which America, on a descending path toward political-economic senility, no longer possesses.

It was only a matter of time before the AIIB made its appearance, China, once having achieved its consolidated economic base (and population shift to heightened urbanization) accompanied by an ideological adaptability shaking off Maoist orthodoxies, as in the Cultural Revolution, has now come into position to confront the West (chiefly the US and EU) on an equal plane through a parity of economic strength. Washington has been blindsided, its very reliance on militarism as the solution to all its problems, industrial, trade, financial–ideology to the point of rigidity the primary orientation lo these many years–forcing one-sided arrangements on its presumed friends and allies, has ultimately backfired, becoming the engine of its economic descent and political-cultural decline. If I were a moralist, I'd term this the wages of sin, war, intervention, regime change, punctuated by covert actions, special forces, drone assassination, embargoes, all for the retrograde purpose of counterrevolutionary stabilization, retrograde, because this course is no longer historically feasible as we find multiple ascending forces in the world, not only China, but much of Asia, including India, and the whole of Africa and Latin America ripe for full-throttle modernization.

The balance of world power is shifting away from the West under present US leadership, to the extent that the AIIB is gaining support and membership in Europe itself, suggesting not that the EU and NATO will dissolve tomorrow, but that the built-in belligerence therein instilled through US influence and pressure may be breaking down, leaving America high and dry rather than, as planned, isolating and containing Russia and China, the chief long-term US aim and purpose. A disaffection in the ranks is not being looked on kindly by the Obama administration, which may partially account for the stridency and note of urgency in current policy vis-à-vis China (Russia a sideshow to keep NATO still in line, the Turkish downing of the Russian jet precisely the kind of provocation intended for that purpose) as though advancing the timetable of US confrontation with China lest the Grand Alliance break up. One senses a desperation and frenetic diplomatic activity in response to the sudden visibility of the AIIB, in the realization that China is taking on America, not on the battlefield, but largely on the US's own professed terms: trade, investment, and industrial development. "Better dead than red" no longer seems applicable as a shibboleth for justifying hostility toward China, although the campaign of counterterrorism subtly invokes and/or calls to mind the earlier anticommunism in stimulating the fears of the American public, leaving a residual though latent taint on China transferring that fear to the present. (I leave the Republican party, its Congressional members, and especially its presidential candidates outside of the discussion, their near-unanimous knee-jerk reaction of favoring war at the drop of a pin, in contrast to the sophisticated retrogression and platitudinous liberalism by its opponents to the same end, leaves them unsuited for other than catastrophic solutions which would prove still more disastrous, as America's friends and allies appear to realize. The choice between the power-politics of stabilized confrontation and Armageddon awaits the nation, but in fairness to the Republicans it should be said that the present Democratic administration and the party at large are hardly risk-adverse, forming a dangerous bipartisan coalition on essentials of war and peace.) The move to discredit, and excite terror of, China in the eyes of the West, if not in that of the world, is nowhere more evident than in America's conscious and unconscious realization of Chinese ascendancy, a world trend which, agonizingly, is matched by America's own decline.

***

Do I exaggerate the trend, and is this ascendancy merely so recent as to coincide with breaking news about the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank? No, on both counts. China has been in the business of developmental economic planning, investment, and construction, particularly attentive to Third World needs, for some time, as have the AIIB's own diplomatic and financial activities, both backed by the Chinese government. (Let me be clear: I am not a cheerleader for capitalism, and given China's transformational energies in that direction, e.g., as manifested in its loan policies and investment acumen, I would have preferred a decisively socialist direction for that country and therefore its impact on world politics. But the issue here is not a love of China, although I think it represents far less of a threat to world peace, because of its ascendant position, than the US, desperate to reverse its long-term if not imminent decline. Pulling at the military ropes to stay afloat lends an air of risk-taking to the overall foreign policy framework.) Consider then a New York Times article, "China's Global Ambitions, Cash and Strings Attached," by Clifford Krauss and Keith Bradsher, the latter words tacked on, in typical Times fashion, to ensure conveying the paper's animus toward China, even though the article is quite neutral. The date: July 24, 2015, before the head-on US assault on the AIIB, but when Obama's military pivot to the Pacific had already become familiar policy.

This concerns only one country, in America's backyard, Ecuador, which already sets off political-economic-military alarm bells, the more so because of location and because there are countless other examples of Chinese investment in Latin America and Africa, originally private hunting preserves for American capital, especially in riding the wave of European de-colonialism of the Third World. Yes, expansion, but hardly Western-brand imperialism at the point of a gun, and—the title—with strings attached. The reporters begin, infrastructure to the foreground: "Where the Andean foothills dip into the Amazon jungle, nearly 1,000 Chinese engineers and workers have been pouring concrete for a dam and a 15-mile underground tunnel. The $2.2 billion project will feed river water to eight giant Chinese turbines designed to produce enough electricity to light more than a third of Ecuador." When one reads Paul Baran's Marxian classic work, The Political Economy of Growth, the contrast with typical imperialist projects is glaring; instead of building rail and port facilities for the sole purpose of extracting the client country's wealth, the improvement stays at home. Not that China didn't do the other as well, as in the construction of a refinery outside the port of Manta, yet a study of the various projects would show a balance struck on the side of internal improvements, infrastructure per se, which does not rob the country of its resources and prevent its modernization. Chinese capital also built factories, and, Krauss and Bradsher note, even with respect to Manta, "Chinese banks are in talks to lend $7 billion for the construction of an oil refinery [just mentioned], which could make Ecuador a global player in gasoline, diesel and other petroleum products."

The contrast with Western style investment only gets better (i.e., less vulturish): "Across the country in villages and towns, Chinese money is going to build roads, bridges, hospitals, even a network of surveillance cameras stretching to the Galapagos Islands. State-owned Chinese banks have already put nearly $11 billion into the country, and the Ecuadorean government is asking for more." Selfless? Surely not, but neither is it narrowly exploitive, for Ecuador is hardly a jewel in the imperialist crown by virtue of population, military prowess, or economic clout, and rather, as the reporters correctly observe, part of a broader societal-historical process of shifting global power: "Ecuador, with just 16 million people, has little presence on the global stage. But China's rapidly expanding footprint here speaks volumes about the changing world order, as Beijing surges forward and Washington gradually loses ground." That The Times sees the latter, America's decline, is somewhat earth-shaking as America's MSM goes. The article also reports that the renminbi is "expected to be anointed soon as a global reserve currency, putting it in an elite category with the dollar, the euro, the pound and the yen"—which actually came about this past week, Washington gnashing its teeth while Bretton Woods negotiators turning in their graves. From gnashing no doubt to rage though not publicly discussed: “China’s state-owned development bank has surpassed the World Bank in international lending. [The organizations we created after World War II to ensure America’s global economic hegemony are being challenged and/or superseded, grounds enough for consternation and a good deal more, to which must be added, as now, wholesale defections from US iron-clad, no deviations leadership on the financial and banking fronts.] And its effort to create an internationally funded institution to finance transportation and other infrastructure has drawn the support of 57 countries, including several of the United States’ closest allies, despite opposition from the Obama administration.”

***

Let’s leave Ecuador, the situation, as I say, being duplicated from Serbia (power plants) to Ethiopia (glass and cement factories) to Venezuela (low-income housing) to Uzbekistan (natural gas pipelines), and bring the analysis up to date, no longer last summer, but AIIB firmly in place, its membership a silent or not so silent refutation of America’s paradigm of unilateral military-economic global dominance. China was excluded from TPP on fallacious grounds, as though the US cared a fig about human rights violations, not only where other nations were concerned but our own record of waterboarding and full menu of torture in black sites worldwide, while China, in contrast, has consistently offered membership to America in AIIB. No takers, of course, the move, even though EU arrangements would be left intact, being seen by the administration as an admission of weakness and capitulation to China’s power—in sum, the falling-domino theory in its economic guise. Even profits cannot supplant the temptations of war, which suggests that the US has become so rigidly ideological that the standard premises and goals of capitalism are being cast aside in what is fast becoming, on the US side, a Manichaeian world view of ceaseless struggle, the framework of adversaries widened from Russia to include, still more imperatively, China.

Jane Perlez’s informative New York Times article, “China Creates a World Bank of Its Own, and the U.S. Balks,” (Dec. 5), this time an accurate title, provides a clear view of the bank’s genesis, its operations, and China’s conception of its role in international politics and economics. The sub-heading, “In setting up the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank, China enlisted American allies, including Britain, even as Washington expressed skepticism,” previews the telling point that a direct blow is being struck at US global supremacy, with ramifications affecting EU and NATO stability via a possible tug-of-war emerging from a bipolar economic world. To America, any sign of disloyalty is a mortal sin, economic, military, anything for that matter. This is the cost of a half-century and more of arrogance backed by military force—a brittle mind-set that demands obedience to its dictates, leaving an ethnocentric we-they dichotomy in its wake.

Perlez begins by discounting the view of China’s ulterior motives of selfish aggrandizement and surreptitious moves toward global military conquest, both currently in vogue in the US: “As top leaders met at a lush Bali resort in October 2013 [note the date, early enough to indicate both the plans for model reconstruction and the test, in the intervening time, on whether profession has been translated into practice], President Xi Jinping of China described his vision for a new multinational, multibillion-dollar bank to finance roads, rails and power grids across Asia. Under Chinese stewardship, the bank would tackle the slow development in poor countries that was holding the region back from becoming the wealth center of the world.” Kerry at the time congratulated Xi, “That’s a great idea,” but, she reports, “the enthusiasm didn’t last long, as the Obama administration began a rear-guard battle to minimize the bank’s influence.” What follows is sheer gibberish, not the fear of military-economic competition, but that China would not respect human rights—or rather, both, the latter considerations becoming well-worn State Department talking points (mine, not Perlez), and worse still, the implied corruption associated with the loans: “The United States worries that China will use the bank to set the global economic agenda on its own terms [as had the US for decades when it was in the driver’s seat], forgoing the environmental protections, human rights, anticorruption measures and other governance standards long promoted by its Western counterparts. American officials point to China’s existing record of loans to unstable governments, construction deals for unnecessary infrastructure, and villagers abruptly uprooted with little compensation.” If the record is so bad, why the alarm; China would be hoisted on its own petard.

Ascribing base motives to others may in fact reflect back on one’s own acts (e.g., drones, covert actions) and thoughts (claims ranging from Exceptionalism to liberal humanitarianism), thereby requiring the denial of the reality of one’s own GUILT and projecting both guilt and the larger reality of stiffing through corruption and misdeeds the victims of one’s own claims to power. I submit that China’s record of developmental assistance, although hardly lily-white, is directed to the real needs of disadvantaged nations and peoples, not the enrichment of assorted cliques in exchange for military bases, safe havens for administering torture, or rules stacked in favor of US market penetration. Those closest to America either appear to be catching on to the one-sided business arrangements, as in TPP and the EU-IMF-World Bank ground-rules for trade, or, equally if not more disheartening from the US’s standpoint, are only going along with the tide, sensing the way the wind is blowing. Perlez writes: “But the administration suffered a humiliating diplomatic defeat last spring when most of its closest allies signed up for the bank, including Britain, Germany, Australia and South Korea. Altogether 57 countries have joined, leaving the United States and Japan on the outside.” And she adds, matter-of-factly: “The calculation for joining is simple. China, with its vast wealth and resources, now rivals the United States at the global economic table.” The IMF’s inclusion of the renminbi this past week is one more match to light the fire of America’s demiurgic itch for Great Powers-showdown.

We are coming full-circle, the inversion of the starting place, in which America was all-powerful and now has to relinquish control of the global economy. “China is taking direct aim at the current development regime,” Perlez, recognizing the import of pending change, observes, “the Bretton Woods system established under the leadership of the United States after World War II to help stabilize currencies and promote growth.” This is an epochal change, the kind that the previously supreme nation does not take lying down, perhaps only microseconds away from the stab-in-the-back legends (aka, terrorism) used so effectively in 1930s Germany in Hitler’s rise to power and coming with greater frequency into prominence in America through a bipartisan consensus on domestic surveillance, the dismantling of the social safety net, and a resurgence of gut-xenophobic hatred toward immigrants. Jin Liquin, who will lead the bank, has written a book, “Bretton Woods: The Next Seventy Years,” in which he shows awareness of where the US is coming from, its fear of suffering decline: “The U.S. risks forfeiting its international relevance while stuck in its domestic political quagmire.” And he adds what might serve as an epitaph on American aspirations for maintaining global hegemony: “History has never set any precedent that an empire is capable of governing the world forever.”

My New York Times Comment on the Perlez article, same date, follows:

Perlez's reporting is superlative, giving us a rounded statement of the AIIB. Its formation is explainable in light of the TPP, which pointedly excluded China. I am encouraged by the geopolitical framework evolving: a check on US economic hegemony through a clear balancing of global financial power. But something else is also important: unlike US hostility to the project and Obama's militarization of the TPP through his military "pivot," backed by significant force in the Pacific, we see instead a non-militarized paradigm of growth underscored by European member states and the eschewal of exclusionary policies.

The administration has reason to be concerned: China is running circles around the US, particularly in its investment strategy of focusing on fundamental infrastructure. Yes, we finally have an alternative to the US-dominated IMF and World Bank, one that both Asia and Africa will find more attractive. The Chinese comment that empires do not last forever is very much to the point, though Washington, unlike Cameron and London, is in the deep throes of denial.

The US is first, last, and always ideological, whereas others, China, etc., can pragmatically advance in their growth process. Obama is carrying America over a cliff by his politicization of economic policy, and more, by his zealous determination to confront, encircle, and if possible isolate both Russia and China. He isn't half the mensch that Xi and Jin are.

DECEMBER 8, 2015

Manufacturing Fear: America's Growth Industry

ISIS is a real threat; I do not suggest otherwise. Its baseness is irreducible, no mitigating factors. Yet, America has been instrumental in its formation, whether as contextual incubator through an international posture of global imperialism or COMPLICIT through the selfsame geopolitical framework in which the US, from its long-standing commitment to "anticommunism" as the generic alarm on behalf of shaping domestic mechanisms of social control and policies of counterrevolution abroad, has aligned itself in a self-constructed power struggle against Russia and China, with similarly reactionary forces, notably, Saudi Arabia and Turkey, in order to check the historical process. Terrorism is an enabling factor in the maintenance and perpetuation of American hegemony. To seek its eradication on the world scene is counterintuitive to the US's mid-life (I'm being charitable) crisis in which it finds itself a declining superpower, less because of an absence of will than because, no longer within its power to control or arrest, the world structure is itself changing and becoming decentralized (no longer susceptible to US unilateral declarations of ORDER) as rival power centers come into being. The US is an anachronism, as the vanguard of retardation of political-economic modernization in the Third World, believing still that military force and negotiated alliances sugared with a lavish dispersal of arms, funds, and bases to all takers will ensure continued ascendancy in the years to come.

To be a vanguard, however, supposes followers—euphemistically, friends and allies, partners—which are precisely beginning to drop away. Obama's great hope in Asia is the Trans-Pacific Partnership, militarily, to contain and isolate China, commercially, to provide absolute political-legal security to American-sponsored multinationals in their quest for markets and cheap labor, protection for patents and intellectual property, etc., which nevertheless is now about to face stiff competition from China's Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank: a sure sign of what is to come as the changing paradigm of global economic development. Like Britain and France at the close of World War II, America is witnessing the decline of Empire, and all the president's horses and all the president's men cannot put humpty dumpty together again. The analogy is valid, the Open Door (i.e., the Imperialism of Free Trade, as Gallagher and Robinson phrased it) the American equivalent of European colonialism, without the expenses of administration, and both manifestations of political-economic dominance no longer structurally tenable. The US is running scared, more military input wherever possible, as in continued intervention and regime change efforts, more intensified doses of thought control, as in the shrinking boundaries of the political process and general intellectual discourse, more reliance on external explanations to hide internal shortcomings—voila, terrorism, not to be met (although now it may be too late, possibly from the invasion of Iraq, or still earlier, US support for the Taliban in Afghanistan, against the Soviets) with a fundamental reversal of course, away from intervention and regime change, or, the very least, combined de-demonization of the Muslim/Arab world and specific ground policies of total engagement against ISIS no matter who else's ox is gored, i.e., Saudi Arabia, Turkey, Qatar, and assorted "moderate forces" of opposition to Assad. Indeed, Assad is the present poster boy designated for annihilation, a convenient scapegoat for sweeping under the rug all manner of hidden agendas, such as the role of OIL in the world economy, which are part and parcel of the larger geopolitical/geostrategic conflict to (a) preserve American power, and (b) militarize still further America's confrontation with China and Russia.

Taking the measure of Obama (and, as in Hollywood extravaganzas, a cast of hundreds if not thousands, drawn from the military, think tanks, financial and business groups, opinion makers in the MSM, and the cacophonous voices of proto-fascism of the so-called political class, for he is not alone in making decisions, and is rather a sounding board for ruling groups which make up the American power structure) as in his Oval Office apologia for maintaining the current counterterrorism schema, one finds suspicious activities in dealing with, or not dealing with, ISIS, as e.g., the failure of the US to bomb oil tankers until now (and under Russian pressure), laden with oil from ISIS-controlled refineries and critical to financing its advances, the demand for closing the Turkish border to Syria until now (ditto Russian pressure) which was an open sesame for jihadists, and the entire role of the Saudis, as part of the wider Sunni offensive both to overthrow Assad's secular government and neutralize Iran's influence in the Middle East. This scratches the surface of US involvement in the region (as numerous writers have observed, ISIS appears to have shown no interest in Israel, perhaps part of the quid pro quo until now—Russia's entrance into the regional conflict aimed specifically at terrorism being seminal to the changing picture—and its heretofore tepid response to ISIS. But Obama cannot have it both ways, conjuring a threat and, by all reports, inducing fear if not paralysis among Americans, at the same time that he skirts around the margins of conflict (air power alone hardly the magic bullet).

I have never been one for conspiracy theory, and, hopefully denying its presence here, I would suggest that the contrived atmosphere of FEAR that has taken hold in America, contrived, in that the stock-in-trade of political life from Washington to the Iowa hamlets, speaks to ulterior motives wholly beyond the measures needed to curb terrorism as a definable force. Of course, from day one the decision was made to by-pass the UN in favor of a US-led organized alliance system which mirrored the realpolitik of American aims on the world scene, utilizing terrorist groups—and its own Special Ops-CIA mode of terrorism to topple what were designated as the adversary from Vietnam to Africa to Latin America—for regime change and/or keeping in power local dictators, all outside the UN framework which the US, like Israel, viewed as poisonous and flaunted at every turn. Yes, my broad-stroke analysis is circumstantial; it would be horrendous to think the US was complicit in the rise and activities of ISIS. We have seen the genesis of the Contras, death squads, armed insurrections, the daily business of the American government in times past; we have seen from McCarthyism through the Patriot Act a hostile environment to progressive ideas and dissent; we have seen a government more invisible in its workings than ever, itself stirring up fears of unrestrained power and having the desired ambiguous effect of seeking its protection (displayed through ardent patriotism) and feeling intimidated by and in its presence. In light of the foregoing, is it completely wrong to be suspicious that the US has been using ISIS to its own advantage, from a military and capitalistic position, until this moment when ISIS appears like the genii escaping from the bottle, its usefulness at an end, thus forcing America—in part because of Russian intervention—to take a stand opposing it? The world at large, outside of the US-EU-NATO orbit, is becoming increasingly less gullible about the nature of counterterrorism as an end in itself, instead looking warily at the American footprint in the stabilization of a global architecture keeping alive US power and influence.

I turn briefly to Gardiner Harris and Michael Shear's New York Times article, "Obama Says of Terrorist Threat: 'We Will Overcome It,'" (Dec.7), for the immediate background, his address to the nation on terrorism. In the aftermath of San Bernardino, he stated of the couple staging the attack: "It is clear that the two of them had gone down the dark path of radicalization. So this was an act of terrorism designed to kill innocent people." The speech was relatively mild in tone: "We cannot turn against one another by letting this fight be defined as a war between America and Islam. That does not mean denying the fact that an extremist ideology has spread within some Muslim communities. This is a real problem that Muslims must confront, without excuse." Yet Harris and Shear point out that the use of the Oval Office (only for the third time in his presidency) was "a setting meant to highlight the gravity of a subject," which led to the announcement of screening airline passengers coming to the US without visas, a ban on the purchase of guns by those on the no-fly-list, and unspecified limits on automatic weapons, once again, reasonableness, nevertheless contradicted by continued intervention to unseat Assad, freeze Russia from a prominent role in reaching a settlement, and holding fast to a world view which, rather than halting the efforts of ISIS's enablers, persists along the main lines of US foreign policy with respect to Russia and China—ISIS at best a distraction from renewing the spirit of a new Cold War.

Actually the reporters' account fails to capture the proportions of the threat as expressed in the speech, as, consulting the text, we find Obama placing terrorism front and center via his single-minded obsession to keep America safe: "For seven years, I've confronted this evolving threat each morning in my intelligence briefing. And since the day I took this office, I've authorized U.S. forces to take out terrorists abroad precisely because I know how real the danger is. As commander in chief, I have no greater responsibility than the security of the American people." Then the personal touch (cruel of me to say, hearts and flowers, playing to his audience?): "As a father of two young daughters who are the most precious part of my life, I know that we see ourselves with friends and co-workers at a holiday party like the one in San Bernardino. I know we see our kids in the faces of the young people killed in Paris. And I know that after so much war [brought on by himself and his predecessor], many Americans are asking whether we are confronted by a cancer that has no immediate cure." A superb draft drawn up by a committee of the whole, the speech has all the earmarks of issuing a warning of imminent danger backed up by a show of humility and family—to which I remain unmoved, as I consider the “collateral damage” of his program of drone assassination, the young daughters of others murdered in the process.

“No immediate cure”? Here Obama in Churchillian mode, more daily prominent, as in his self-reference above to being commander in chief—a tinny rhetoric where the White Cliffs of Dover give way to the shores of Chesapeake Bay (and all points north and south), “Well, here’s what I want you to know: The threat of terrorism is real, but we will overcome it. We will destroy ISIL and any other organization that tries to harm us. Our success won’t depend on tough talk, or abandoning our values, or giving into fear. That’s what groups like ISIL are hoping for. Instead, we will prevail by being strong and smart, resilient and relentless, and by drawing upon every aspect of American power.” This last, if one listens closely, is most chilling. Not more so than his peroration however, which pulls out all the stops of patriotic cant: “My fellow Americans, I am confident we will succeed in this mission because we are on the right side of history. We were founded upon a belief in human dignity—that no matter who you are, or where you come from, or what you look like, or what religion you practice, you are equal in the eyes of God and equal in the eyes of the law.”

My New York Times Comment on the Harris-Shear article, same date, follows:

Obama appears statesmanlike when compared with the Republican opposition, salivating to press forward with total war; yet his own remarks are fraudulent and contrived, invoking the spirit of Dr. King’s “We Shall Overcome” and praising America as exceptionalist and possessing unsullied democratic values. In truth he deep-down reflects the same contempt for democracy as his Republican opposition. Would ISIS have had the same recruiting success, indeed genesis, absent the US record of war, intervention, covert action, regime change, drone, assassination, embargoes, etc. etc, a long shadow of disgraceful imperialism and global military hegemony?

In a profound sense, America created ISIS by its pattern of military-financial-commercial globalization, playing up to, if not creating, dictatorial regimes to smoothe the way to market penetration and related activities. As for the US’s previous record on attacking ISIS, Obama’s critics have a point that America has been slow and desultory, but they don’t ask WHY. Perhaps Obama and the US found (until the situation, as now, got out of hand) ISIS was useful to have around, justifying the full dimensions of counterterrorism policy, e.g., massive surveillance within the country itself, and of course legitimating ever-expanding military budgets at the expense of both infrastructure and the social safety net.

America is declining not because of terrorism but its moral collapse in furthering the agenda of an advanced stage of capitalism.

DECEMBER 11, 2015

Dark Forebodings: America at the Cross-Roads

No, neither the Hebrew prophet Amos nor Priam’s daughter Cassandra inspires these thoughts, but the actual condition, ideological/psychological, of the contemporary American mindset, and its material foundations, an overly-ripened stage of capitalist development needing a constant infusion of power abroad, inner certitude at home, to maintain an acceptable rate of economic growth and the conviction that its military strength is sufficiently intimidating and in evidence as to provide for the unilateral determination of the global structure after its own wishes and image. Nothing short of that would satisfy, a nation running on (moral) empty, fear-ridden in extremis, unwilling and unable to adapt to the prevailing realities: its own deeds of commission, the principal war-maker, intervener, cause of human suffering, since World War II, which has in turn stimulated dislocations and engendered resistance, and the interrelated historical-political dynamics, partly in response, partly a function of independent industrial, technological, and scientific forces unstoppable as previously underdeveloped, exploited, countries, realizing their own potential and acting on it, demand a place for themselves and their people at the World Table. The US is no longer the sole determiner—if in fact it ever was, taking into account the incipient thirst for freedom of the persecuted and downtrodden which would eventually find expression—of human destiny. Time is not, and perhaps should not be, on America's side, as it bullies all in its path whilst the international system exhibits gradual yet drastic and permanent change.

The notable change is a growing decentralization of world power, America's holding action via counterrevolutionary policies which have thwarted Third World autonomy and fostered global armament races intended to keep its real and potential rivals in check no longer seems to work. As plainly seen, the Emperor wears no clothes, or rather is so sheathed in body armor as to be weighted down with Maginot-like walls of defensiveness inculcating a spirit of pervasive fear of the Stranger (this week the governor and attorney general of Texas tried to prevent a family of Syrian refugees, including six children, from settling there, on the ground that they and others might be suspected terrorists, part of a landslide sentiment opposing immigrant settlement). Trump, as we know, advocates for wholesale proscription of Muslims, and despite gestures from all sides of disagreement, it is obvious he has struck a sympathetic authoritarian chord in Americans' minds, one inseparable from the nation's championing of so-called gun-rights, an amalgam of rigidifying ideology synthesizing ethnocentrism and preternatural violence as the raw materials of proto-fascism. No question, that is the direction the country is heading, these eruptions of gun violence merely the surface twitches of a society denied its dream of conquest on the world scene.

We as Americans internalize the militarization of our value system, transmogrifying it from one that purports to be democratic, however dishonored in historical practice, to that of an assault on the rule of law as a solemn compact between government and people to ensure equality as a human birthright. Instead, billionaire is the new arithmetic of American capitalism, corporate mergers (today, pharmaceuticals, chemicals, tomorrow, who knows what's next?), and further never-ceasing attempts at regime change accompanied by agreements integrating defense and trade into a geopolitical structure bent on rolling back the historical process to recapitulate the benefits of traditional imperialism, to which, in addition to market penetration and securing raw materials, we find in US-sponsored globalization a range of ambitions unknown to the late-19th century, its heyday, such as outsourcing industrial production and control of international finance. Globalization is merely America in macrocosm, or so it is hoped. Even Europe, its kept ally in all things commercial, financial, and military, is beginning to demure, as in looking fondly at China's Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank. In fact, where the American Empire may find itself most vulnerable in the short run, its Achilles' heel being exposed for the first time, is not the challenges mounted by China and Russia to its economic supremacy, but a disillusionment with America's iron-clad determination to remain on top of the changing world system on the part of Britain, France, and Germany. The EU-NATO shield and spearhead for US control of the West, extending to the Russian border, is starting to crack, just as comparable plans for Asia are also, now with AIIB and firmer cohesion of the BRICS, ready for the ashan.

But not without a fight. The US is tightening its hold on its own people, if not in preparation for Armageddon (the prominence of religious zealotry is surely a sign of contemporary amorphous fears increasingly pointed to the search for scapegoats), then at least a take-no-chances view of security as the new Absolute already previewed in NSA's massive surveillance program of the American public, whose genesis lies in decades of pumped-up anticommunism to destroy the spirit of political and mental independence. It's the season for Handel's Messiah, in which we hear the echo of a more innocent and trusting time in the words, "We all like sheep have gone astray," which thought now becomes mandate and license for reducing humans into sheep and penning them up, lest any go astray and seek social justice and international peace. Welcome, the 2016 presidential election, wherein we are "free" to choose from the likely candidates the Maximum Leader to take us down the path of a Vesuvius discharge of hatred toward whomever and whatever appears a denial of American Exceptionalism. Who needs a social safety net, save for the manifestly unfit; ditto, those who shy away from aggression and confrontation with America's Enemies, to which, beyond unfitness, we must add the lack of patriotism. A boiling cauldron of ethnocentric withdrawal awaits the American future.

DECEMBER 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton: Ilse Koch of Chappaqua

At first sight, the comparison between Hillary Clinton and Ilse Koch may seem farfetched, impudent, even hysterical, but I think not, for we are tapping a deep-lying thread of amoral cynicism common to both which leads to a desexualization of cruelty as each proudly enters the "man's world" of identifying with war, violence, militarism—Koch's familiarity with, influence in, and personal satisfaction from, playing an administrative role in the Nazi death camps, and Clinton's advocacy of force, calling for surges in Afghanistan, boasting she can "belt 'em down" with the best of the military class, and, as Secretary of State, leading the charge for US global hegemony helping to set the agenda for confrontation with Russia and China. Both can be seen as team players in an authoritarian framework of government. Both owed their prominence to complicity with the commission of atrocities, Koch, the Beast of Buchenwald (aka Die Hexe [Witch] von Buchenwald), who selected tattooed prisoners to be murdered and skinned, evidence pointing to the skins being used as lampshades, Clinton, less dramatically, promoting and/or endorsing the entire record of barbarism from Iraq onward fueling administration pugnacity (e.g., Libya), whether as First Lady, Senator from New York, Secretary of State, or now, the leading Democratic candidate for president, still unflinching in moving one or two steps ahead of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

I say desexualization because, ironically she skillfully plays the gender card and expects massive political support from women while simultaneously cultivating the image of the uber-mensch, toughness, combat-ready, experienced in the ways of geopolitical planning and thinking, in sum, a commander-in-chief in waiting, hard-as-nails, we can be sure, in protecting the American Homeland! (The difference between a Trump and Clinton presidency is miniscule, certainly in foreign policy, but also, given her closeness to Wall Street, in domestic as well.) I don't have the stomach to dwell on Koch's biography; her Nazi concentration camp record speaks for itself. But as a base line for analysis, she provides a grotesque example of what a power-driven ego can do with respect to riding roughshod over human rights. Under the cloak of respectability, our Hillary truly takes the cake, stalwartly marching in lockstep with, since her husband's presidency down to the present (and we can assume the future), every intervention, regime change, covert action, distribution of military assistance to "friends and allies," accompanying trade agreement to buttress US commercial penetration, all of the foregoing and more, the pivot to Asia, imposed austerity measures via the IMF and World Bank on nations struggling with debt, as part of the vision she shares with political-military leaders of American unilateral global dominance.

Hillary has desexualized her presidential candidacy and ambitions by transcending gender in favor of demonstrating an iron will, toughness, the art of realpolitik, all on behalf of US financial-military power directed to shaping the global structure to America's advantage. This Wall Street-Pentagon integration of national identity would ordinarily mark a Rightist ideology and practice, which in any case summarizes the bipartisan consensus/coalition on war, intervention, regime change she personifies, but in this case she skillfully obfuscates through playing the gender card as well, in hopes of winning the women's vote and making that a sign of liberalism, indeed progressivism, cancelling out in the public mind the promotion of the governing synthesis of militarism and advanced capitalism. Whether she poses a greater danger to world peace and domestic social welfare measures than, say, Trump, Cruz, or Rubio, is, to me, a moot question. We've heard enough in the current campaign about the lesser-evil-argument (Sanders, I contend, is no better, when it comes to foreign policy, itself decisive as a determinant of democratic prospects at home and abroad), to be put off guard by her record of consistent support for the social and structural foundations of corporate wealth and an active posture of confrontation in foreign policy. Yes, a Democrat through and through, hiding behind seemingly just causes, not to balance out but cover over a Warfare State in expansionist mode.

Hillary has proudly entered a "man's world" valuing an amoral cynicism which has allowed her to politicize gender to suit her convenience while desexualizing the framework and atmosphere of POWER so as to sanction yet exonerate cruelty and violence because acting in the name of American democracy and exceptionalism. This goes a long way in defining the cornerstone of a unitary domestic-foreign policy which, as her record of silence on massive surveillance, drone assassination, economic embargoes destructive of health and well-being, suggests an affinity toward authoritarian governance most recently highlighted by her repudiation of transparency in maintaining a private email account while serving as Secretary of State. In that position, she led the charge on global hegemony, calling for confrontation and containment with respect to Russia and China, the surge of troop strength in Afghanistan exceeding the requests of the Joint Chiefs, and the overthrow of Gaddafi and Assad resulting in the widespread devastation of both Libya and Syria and its attending human misery. Ukraine, too, following neocon dictates, was a case of regime change having extreme consequences for the reawakening of Cold War tensions.

But whether as First Lady, Senator from New York, Secretary of State, or the leading Democratic candidate for president, we see a continuity of pugnacious behavior harnessed to a larger-than-life ego-formation which gives vent to (again my theme of a desexualization of power/politics) her cultivation of the uber-mensch imagery, simultaneous with using the gender card in the expectation of gaining massive political support from women. This opportunistic contradiction features themes of toughness, combat readiness, experience in geopolitical ways of planning and thinking, in sum, a commander-in-chief in waiting, hard-as-nails, which is then softened by a no doubt genuine regard for health and children's issues (the Democrats' peculiar mix of welfare-warfare) that nonetheless creates a context harmful to both health and children as in the weakening of the social safety net at home and carnage affecting children abroad. This is less a matter of hypocrisy than a self-justifying arrogance of power, exceptionalism its public-relations exterior, of which Hillary merely exemplifies what the nation at large believes, hence a hidden source of her appeal, the confidence reposed in her to protect the American Homeland and, be it noted, in concert with a comforting liberalization (in ideology) of the practice of war.

Under the cloak of respectability, Hillary marches in lockstep, since her husband's presidency to the present (and we can assume the future), with every intervention, regime change, or covert action, every distribution of military assistance to "friends and allies" along with accompanying trade agreement to buttress US commercial penetration, all of the foregoing and more, the pivot to Asia, imposed austerity measures via the IMF and World Bank on nations struggling with debt, as part of the vision she shares with political-military leaders of American unilateral global dominance. In her various roles, she has not been an original thinker (especially in failing to develop and hone an alternative policy-construct to her party's interventionism, which is only slightly less retrograde than that of Republicans, and even on health care, favoring the private insurance forces over a single-payer system). Instead, she is a team player; she smells out the centers of power, muscles in, intuitively senses what sells, what public image she should and could strike, and thus an ever-alert perpetual machine of personal advancement convinced that with each step a milestone she is destined for greatness.

Wellesley, Yale Law, the march for honors and office begins, if not sooner. Our Goldwater Girl discovers early on the political and career advantages of liberalism, advocacy for children (for which I grant her sincerity) a pathway to policymaking which had the effect of strengthening both the military and corporate business, neither of which, as noted, helped to democratize the social system on which children's rights and welfare depend. Though child advocacy and health care may have been well-intended, they were also the perfect gloss for advancing a Corporate Agenda in which government supported capital accumulation, whether through an aggressive policy of market penetration or a regulatory framework sympathetic to banking and business. We see this, e.g., in her acceptance of Robert Rubin's policies as Bill's Treasury secretary, and in her own closeness (as well as her husband's) to the relevant communities of interest, which, as reported, enabled her to give 20-minute speeches to financial and business groups at $200,000 a throw. Needless to say, the couples' facility for raising large sums of money is legendary. Hillary, like Bill's more-folksy image, is the ideal public face of Wall Street and qua woman that of the Pentagon, granted, a shattering of gender stereotypes, but for that reason an effective voice, particularly as Secretary of State, for torture, regime change, the infliction of collateral damage on civilian populations. (Gender rights as recently established by the Pentagon confers equal participation on women in prosecuting US war aims, and though I do not wish to engage in stereotypy or gender-profiling, this invites complicity in imperialism, intervention, and crimes against humanity, a co-optative move ultimately to the disparagement of freedom for men and women alike.)

Hillary never considered resigning in moral protest against her administration's policies, nor has she subsequently disavowed them, her belligerent tone a hallmark underpinning her national and party appeal in the current race. Admittedly, in law school there seemed the promise of better things, as in working at Marian Wright Edelman's Washington Research Project, which brought her into contact with the plight of migrant labor, and, in her post-Law School year, at the Yale Child Study Center, which led to arguing for the legal competence of children. Too, she did a stint in Washington researching conditions for impeachment for the Judiciary Committee on Watergate. Then began Arkansas, where Bill preceded her, their marriage, after his many proposals, consummated finally, because she feared a loss of identity detracting from the credit she would receive for her achievements. From 1975 to 1982 she remained Rodham. I have no quarrel with that, only with what in this case it pointed to, a somewhat Nietzschean will to power which played to win, ran roughshod over opponents, and rationalized a tendency to graze the truth. Within Arkansas her ambition flourished, first, joining a prestigious law firm, then Carter's appointment to the Legal Services Corporation board, and a mixed record of investments (Whitewater).

As First Lady, however, she takes off; her interest in child development and health care issues appears genuine, and this combined with active foreign travel and speaking internationally on behalf of women's rights (the Beijing Conference on Women, 1995) raises her political visibility. Wouldst that she paused there, laid a foundation for authentic human concerns, and channeled her ambitions therein, we would have a very different Hillary today, perhaps one who posed an alternative to the bipartisan consensus on war, ethnocentrism, business consolidation. Instead, no such luck, and rather, the White House years and consequent exposure to power bent her in the direction that we presently see, a synthesis of corporatism and militarism which epitomizes the Democratic party itself, making it a pale carbon copy of the Republicans. Amid the salutary work on behalf of children and women, we already find disquieting signs of, at the very least, political hanky-panky, and possible wrongdoing, on the order of the Whitewater Development Corporation, where investment losses had been improperly subsidized through the efforts of Hillary's law firm, the so-called Travelgate scandal, in which financial irregularities of the White House travel office (the relevant memo had been buried for two years) served as the pretext for firing staff to be replaced by Arkansas loyalists, etc., all resulting in avoidance of criminal prosecution and raised eyebrows, while Hillary emerged squeaky-clean. On the Lewinsky Affair Hillary stayed the dutiful wife, one consideration being her own future political career.

In the US Senate she supported the Patriot Act, its reauthorization, war in Afghanistan, and in Iraq, visiting troops in both theaters, and helped introduce legislation enlarging the US Army beyond what the Chiefs had called for. That was the first term; the second was a shoo-in due to a weak opponent, despite which, she raised prodigious sums so as to win big (2/3 of the vote). She was part of a large majority that passed the Troubled Asset Relief Program, a $700 billion bailout of the banking system following the 2007-08 financial crisis. (Her support of Wall Street, from the days of Rubin, Summers, Geithner, in Bill's Cabinet on, has never wavered.) Still in the US Senate, and reportedly since 2003, Hillary was making active plans for a presidential run, setting up an exploratory committee for 2008, and, locked in primary battles with Obama, the two political fakirs of the first water, neither revealing actual or latent tendencies toward war (Obama under the guise of Exceptionalism, Hillary, Liberalism), the campaign turned in Obama's favor, Hillary at the convention strongly endorsing him.

But it was as Secretary of State that her hegemonic sympathies were fully revealed, a hawk among hawks, whether among neocons or the military, expressing the doctrine of so-called soft power which combined the bluntness of military force with the sophistication of NGO activities, claims of commitment to human rights, development funds, etc., i.e., liberal humanitarianism at gunpoint. Here gender rights became the fulcrum for continued Afghan intervention, thus placing America on the side of the angels. (Politicizing gender rights, Hillary's signature in the conduct of foreign policy, and now for base support in the coming election, is a classic case of ideological obfuscation while all else remains constant if not, as in global military unilateralism, actually accelerated.) Ah, she got behind the drive to give cookstoves to the world's poor, as though that would alter fundamental power arrangements in these countries as well as in the international setting. More to the point, as Secretary, has been her silence in the face of war crimes committed by the Obama administration, as in regime change, drone assassination, and embargoes designed to inflict privation and suffering. Silence is consent, if not indeed an active role in designing policy, particularly since foreign policy is the area of State's responsibility and cannot be shrugged off. A team player, she represents the cog-in-the-wheel facilitation of human deprivation. The better part of honor, once the record is apparent, would be to resign, and go into opposition—wholly unthinkable to her, on both counts, as well as to Washington in general, not to say the vast majority of the public.

Hillary's interest in the Far East, perhaps because her term as Secretary was still early, is largely unnoticed and then later overshadowed by the Middle East, but her pointed criticisms of China presaged the full articulation of the Obama pivot, as did her cultivation of friendship with the neighbor's of China. Libya though became her baby, all-out intervention, partly to depose Gaddafi, but also bring the Arab Spring under manageable control, with results with which we are still contending. She also supported the Special Ops mission to kill bin Laden, whatever the cost to US-Pakistan relations. And coming more up to date, one finds Hillary even more anti-Assad in Syria than Obama, this already in 2012. She also, going back to Libya, toughened out her response to the Congressional investigation into Benghazi, a look at how she takes criticism which indirectly bears on her contempt for government transparency through her handling of the email imbroglio, which caught her flat-footed in deception and the suppression of evidence.

I think we've seen enough, a trail of war-appropriate public policy and failure to speak out at the abuses of the present government, whether on massive domestic surveillance, regulatory paralysis, ever-expanding Pentagon activism (new bases added to the hundreds in operation), or more of the same when it comes to wealth concentration and respect for the environment, a hardly viable alternative to Trump-Cruz-Rubio and the Republicans. Hillary stands at the top of the slippery slope of fascism, the others already in the process of sliding down, she about to join them at the bottom should she be successfully elected. And yes, not to forget Ilse Koch, I did not mean a point-by-point comparison, but that she and Hillary have respectively pushed their existing frameworks of society to their outer boundaries as the enablers of a political-economic system underwritten by monopolistic organization and fueled by military power, detrimental to the world's population and the instincts of social decency.

DECEMBER 18, 2015

Failure of the American Left: Iron-Fisted Co-Optation

This week, Tuesday (Dec. 15) to be exact, I was a guest on Gary Null's WBAI/Pacifica radio show, preceded by Chris Hedges, a solid analyst and critic of the contemporary social order, to discuss the failure of American radicalism to act as a transformative political-ideological social force in opposition to repression at home, intervention abroad. As usual, Gary's questions prodded interviewees through his penetrating insights to launch into orbit with mini-monologues on the given topic, and Chris was superb in his portion, focusing on Woodrow Wilson's administration, its pursuit of repayment for Morgan and other bankers' loans to European nations threatened by German victory as reason for intervention, its Creel Committee (CPI) steady propaganda to control public opinion, and of course its suppression of radicals, notably the Wobblies, as the genesis for modern-day US antiradicalism. This is persuasive but doesn't go far enough either on Wilson or on America.

Let me here sketch out a more long-term analysis of the problem, not in criticism of Chris, for whom surviving radicalism is in debt for whatever life it still maintains, but merely as a further take on the situation of America's declining Left. First, one must enlarge the historical context, Wilson simply one though perhaps pivotal step in the societal process of curbing and seeking to eliminate radicalism as having legitimacy in what, after all, has been the continuity of American capitalist development from the late 18th century through the present, which has narrowed the boundaries of structural and social change stifling the rise of ALTERNATIVE formations such as socialism and a more humane political culture and system of values. This is not a deterministic formulation, but only points up the conscious functioning and furtherance of class dynamics by which ruling groups have taken control through the normalization of capitalist fundamentals of wealth-and-power accumulation in a hierarchical framework. Exploitation plays a significant role, so does a market economy, so does the Constitutional, legal, and ideological protection of the property right, so does the suppression of labor violence, so does commercial penetration increasingly taking on global dimensions, so does the military factor, whether as the spirit of militarism, naval power in action, intervention, in ensuring the realization of a closed, one-track pattern of growth confronting and dismissive of all challenges to its moral rightness.

For better or worse (and I obviously think the latter), America is locked into a Capitalist Order admitting no deviations from government servitude to its needs for security and expansion, the State invariably the handmaiden of business in its myriad forms and undertakings. Liberalism from the start encapsulates the capitalist world view, as C.B. Macpherson brought out in his seminal book, The Political Theory of Possessive Individualism, in which proprietorship of the self becomes the primal act of owning, then extended to all things, ownership, next to God in the ranking of beatific splendor; and as Louis Hartz also brought out, in his book, The Liberal Tradition in America, in which he argues that America never had a feudal past, that instead it was born mature, a capitalist polity from its inception, having puristic capitalist institutions of property which separated it from the premodern structures and ethos of 17th century Europe. To be born capitalist as a nation, becomes a decided historical advantage in keeping the lid on in circumscribing and circumventing radicalism, placing the burden of proof for social change and democratization always on the dissenter, the protester, the radical. (One need not consult Karl Marx on the commodity structure, declining rate of profit, and other features of capitalism to gain a clear picture of class structure, alienation, a mono-cultural ideology, and the human-authored sources of historical materialism, for the record is before us and these writers, along with a multitude of others, have shown or implied the profound depths of antiradicalism in the American mind. John Locke is not V.I. Lenin.)

Even the political economy of American slavery, the seeming exception to the central focus on capitalist institutions, as rather, instead, exemplifying premodern, or semi-feudal, institutions, turns out to be eminently capitalistic, from the standpoint of investments, markets, profits, if still not on a plane with industry and agriculture in the North. But that per se is reason enough for fighting the Civil War (thank you Charles Beard), as working toward a more unified capitalist system of production and exchange, with the commensurate infusion of racism throughout the nation, the fuller popularization of exploitation, and the confirmed supremacy of the national government free now to address the needs and problems of a business civilization. The Civil War now opens not closes a chapter in the continuous stabilization, concentration, expansion of American capitalism, with the Great Railway Strike of 1877 a preview of labor suppression to follow, the Haymarket Affair of 1886 adding radicals and radicalism to the list of undesirables, and the Pullman Strike (Lockout) of 1894, all as highlights attempting to snuff out the lights of radicalism. Labor is by no means totally beaten down as the 20th century began, but from TR through Hoover, Wilson a standout performer, it has taken its licks, withdrawn more into itself, typified by Gompers' leadership of class accommodation, not class struggle, and seeking, as in the building trades, a respectability, akin to 100% Americanism, nullifying its radical potential in the process.

Turning, then, to Wilson, one must be reminded of two things, first, that Theodore Roosevelt before him had already brought to greater perfection the antiradical agenda in US history, pace Chris's locus of attention, and second, Wilson did greater damage to radicalism than generally viewed, suppression being the excrescence of a policy of government-business interpenetration which solidified capitalism under State protection (the euphemism, "regulation," turning out to be on behalf of the interests to be regulated, anticompetitive in nature to facilitate monopolism and turn the business community still more in the direction of foreign trade than did even TR). Wilson "improved" on Roosevelt, the Battleship Navy, Panama, overseas markets, in foreign policy, through a framework of liberal internationalism that Gordon Levin brilliantly explored in his Woodrow Wilson and World Politics, a course steering between traditional imperialism and revolutionary socialism, between Germany and Russia, with the tilt of greater opposition to the latter, with the Siberian Intervention, which Levin correctly sees as the inception of the Cold War lasting to this day. As for domestic policy, TR again serves as precedent (even before, we see the Interstate Commerce Commission), beating Wilson to the interpenetration-punch with his Bureau of Corporations, signaling and signifying the co-partnership of government and the House of Morgan ostensibly for regulating the banking system, and the Hepburn Act, ditto for railroads.

But, yes, Wilson deserves "credit" as more than the continuation of TR, for in key areas of the economy, regulation dwarfs in importance the suppression of labor and radicalism in defining the structural and political climate for the decline of an American Left, the levers of power now completely centered in the advancing stage of corporate and financial capitalism. Notably, the Federal Reserve System practically mandated the centralization of banking under government auspices, and the Federal Trade Commission did the same for business, resulting in the creation of the domestic foundations of monopoly capital preparatory to unilateral global ascendancy. By the 1920s labor had internalized Americanism to the hilt, the AFL ceasing to be, if it ever was, a progressive social force, so that unions, a critical component of radicalism, ceased to function as a challenge to capitalism. Did the New Deal change the basic setting of Reaction? This is for me the basic question, the answer to which puts the decline of American radicalism into historical perspective. Chris rightly pointed out that FDR boasted he had saved capitalism, yet for a brief interlude, grounded in havoc of human suffering in the Great Depression, saving capitalism had a temporary democratizing effect, which I believe Roosevelt had recognized and intended.

This was more than subterfuge or deception. On the one hand, unquestionably the National Recovery Administration (see Sidney Fine's splendid work on the automobile industry under the NRA) strengthened monopolization through the code authorities—TR's Bureau of Corporations updated under Hugh Johnson to bear a striking similarity to Mussolini's corporatist measures and Nazi-organized business "fronts," a perhaps too easily-forgotten aspect of the New Deal having proto-fascist structural consequences, yet did not dominate over nor erase the other and I think more encompassing aspect of the New Deal, the genuine reaching out to the poor, the attack on unemployment, the blossoming of political and cultural radicalism, and, in the Wagner Act, encouragement of labor to organize, with the rise of the CIO (through its efforts as well, as in the Sit-Down Strikes) the militant alternative to the craft-oriented AFL. By the end of the 1930s, this was a different ballgame, at least it seemed, for the determination of America's future. Yet, war intervened, and as we see with A. Mitchell Palmer's contrived Red Scare during and following World War I, the Second World War and more particularly its aftermath saw the widening of social tensions, the rollback of labor's gains, loyalty oaths, the purging of dissent in unions and the universities, translated into an all-embracing McCarthyism, itself the symbol for a wave of anticommunism (McCarthy a logical progression from Palmer, with Martin Dies and HUAC somewhere in between) designed and intended to bludgeon working people to patriotic submission in business dominance and foreign military expansion, and therefore the historical suffocation of radicalism, a plateau reached by, say, 1960 representing not only a repudiation of societal gains made in the New Deal, but also (McCarthyism here perhaps a pivotal point) the closing of the borders of the American mind.

From Kennedy to Obama (Democratic bookends to bipartisan corporate hegemony and proto-fascist policies of aggression and counterrevolution) the grand march of militarized advanced-capitalism has continued, labor and radicalism battered in war's aftermath now—with Kennedy-Johnson as political-structural take-off—internalizing Social Patriotism (the Vietnam war as the convenient midwife for ideological closure) as a boa-constrictor stranglehold on free thought. Nothing in today's presidential contest surprises me, including the bold consensus operating in both parties for counterterrorism as the next stage for, or refinement of, anticommunism, as code for further submission to the privatization of human consciousness, public property, and Nature itself, and globalization as the medium and mechanism for undisputed American world supremacy, amply supported by a universalized US military presence and power, from bases to trade agreements, to alliance systems and joint maneuvers with "friends and allies," to foreign aid embodied in weaponry, training, and advisors, to the manipulation of international bodies starting with the IMF and World Bank, to, finally, though the list might continue ad nauseam, an alacrity to proceed with covert action and regime change to keep the pot boiling at home and punish dissenting forces from US suzerainty (yet still interfering in internal affairs) abroad—all leading to the knuckling under, the overawing, of the American public, especially its labor and radical elements.

The Wilsonian Ideal, however, may prove decisive for the ideological kneecapping of labor and radicals, a stimulus in the last analysis for false consciousness in which purported opposition to the Right (Germany/traditional imperialism) provided incentive and license for, and appeared to necessitate, an anti-Left position of equal if not greater strength, resulting in a Centrism as the expression of the status quo of corporate monopoly capitalism, assuredly a false centrism which contains the existing structure of wealth and power and its militarized accompaniment gained in the present-day at the expense of the Left and to policy makers an almost nonexistent Right. Projecting ahead, we find World War II Centrism to be in opposition to the Axis Powers while simultaneously (as in delaying the opening of a Second Front, the use of atomic bombs at Hiroshima and Nagasaki before the Soviet Union entered the Pacific war establishing claims to the occupation of Japan, and curtailing guerrilla and/or Marxist forces in China, Greece, etc.) planning to contain Russia and even develop a slew of policies aimed at the political-economic subordination of our own allies. Centrism, then, was/is a hoax, a stalking horse for American capitalism internationally, while at home a certification of Exceptionalism and democracy in which radicalism has no place, economic and military power is used only for humane purposes, and the Right is avidly portrayed as by definition the true freedom fighters because of their assault on the Left, from Chiang Kai-shek to Pinochet to Sisi and at many points in-between.

To conclude, my segment with Gary (I don't have a transcript, and my memory is notoriously bad) continued the discussion of the decline of American radicalism in which I emphasized the historical structuralization of repression, all points on the capitalist compass working toward the breakdown of independent volition so that, as reflected in the consistent shift rightward, one finds the internalization of values propelled from the top downward, i.e., radiating from the centers of power AND from the very nature of the political economy. One reason I place less stock in specific sources of repression, e.g., the Patriot Act, is because capitalism itself qua system manufactures repression as the condition of its existence. Structure (as in hierarchy), politics (as in fundamental agreement on the authority of upper groups), and culture (as in the cleansing of ideas to conform to a scripted ideology of closure, excluding class consciousness as demeaning to the individual) all three converge on the inculcation of loyalty to the System and its supposed betters as the natural leaders, and all three legitimate a political culture grounded in the property right as divine gospel, in both cases resulting in a vacuum of moral authority to be filled by drone assassination and whatever else cunning, devious minds contrive to ensure the continuation (quite literally) of business-as-usual, a behavioral syndrome busily engaged in fleeing from the penitentiary and/or war-crimes tribunals. Only, the culprits never seem to get caught, and instead get elected to higher office or occupy a corner suite at Morgan, Chase.

DECEMBER 21, 2015

Structural Repression: America's "Soft"-Fascism

Collective absorption into a rotting system may appear volitional, therefore consensus, but in fact represents structural fascism, an historically evolving societal formation and framework of power in which all reference to peace, justice, economic and cultural democratization has been weakened if not eliminated from consciousness through a pounding, reinforced assertion and affirmation of CAPITALISM. Structural because seemingly self-evident and painless, while in reality the process of what amounts to ideological acculturation takes on a universal suffocative effect through every available means of manipulation/compulsion, from a patriotism generated by and associated with war to everyday symbols of national pride drumming home the theme of exceptionalism. The American, much as Steig's famous New Yorker cartoon of the individual trapped in his/her psychoanalytical cubicle muttering "People are no damn good," is boxed-in to a narrow epistemological space of adherence to total passivity, conformity, loyalty. Force is not ruled out to achieve political-ideological acquiescence in America, for much as in the way Marx describes the stage of primitive accumulation in Das Capital, the enclosure movement in seventeenth-century England (a superb example of structural repression), America has had its analogous situation of primitive accumulation in the bloody suppression of the labor movement, say, 1877-1938, from the railway strikes of the first bloody era, to the sit-down strikes of the New Deal, with countless local skirmishes in between: a formative context of state militias, government troops, and Pinkertons pressing down on working people to ensure unions (when permitted) would be safe (the Nazi parallel, soldiers-in-industry) and radicalism would be declared unacceptable and un-American.

Here we are, the close of 2015, after more than two centuries of the unquestioned ascendancy of capitalism, to all intents, an exclusively capitalist polity, the principal institutions of the social order, particularly government and the military, functioning solely on its behalf, to the point in which capitalism itself disappears within, and is identified as, the society's way of life. Hardness is the preparatory stage to softness, America as the macrocosm of Skinner's box conditioning the behavior of rats. We are rats dressed in the finery of a free people, dedicated however to stripping those of whom we disapprove of their finery (i.e., dignity as human beings) so as to become rats and no more—a de-legitimation of all things contrary to US demands, values, and expectations. Only some are coming to recognize that what we do to others establishes the precedent for doing the same to ourselves, chickens coming home to roost, as in the determined effort to cheapen labor while strengthening the economic-social bonds of upper groups to act in concert as a cohesive ruling group for the perversion of democracy and the negation of the social welfare.

It is all so simple and straightforward, a normalization of repression as translated somehow, via consumerism, sport, popular culture, into freedom, notwithstanding the narrow boundaries for its expression. Consider the presidential debates currently underway, in which the only thing distinguishing the parties is tone, not substance, a matter-of-fact acceptance of imperialism as America's right, and refusal to stare into the abyss of America's moral emptiness when it comes to employment, a living wage, medical benefits, the state of quality education for every child and opportunities to expand from there, all sacrificed to presumed exigencies of the Garrison State, a massive military budget destroying the vitals of civilized society. Militarization, too, is normalized as the nation's condition of existence, militarism the proudly proclaimed yet at the same time hidden motivating spirit because couched in the rhetoric of survival, righteousness, duty to God and country (a neatly-tied bundle of Exceptionalism). Barrington Moore's Harvard lectures on political sociology referenced what he termed "narcotization," the appeal of bread-and-circuses to keep the populace tractable, an idea not unlike Herbert Marcuse's, stated in, I believe, the epilogue to Reason and Revolution, the absorption of society's negativity, perhaps an Hegelian way of saying, all systems go in curtailing/destroying opposition to the System.

Soft Fascism, quotation marks removed because we have become reconciled to our condition of self-repression, even to the point of praising it Panglossian-fashion as the best of all possible worlds. How comforting to know that we can stare eyeball-to-eyeball with Putin and Xi in light of our immense nuclear arsenal, and if the Conflagration comes, so be it, we have always been right from the start! The morality of profound immorality, the reliance on force to achieve the Nirvana of ultimate peace—as in the collective death wish of a failed social order, returning us to my starting point: collective absorption into a rotting system. Look at those who represent “America’s finest” in the political arena, jackals of despair who mouth platitudes of strength. Last night’s Democratic debate (Dec. 18), the supposed opposition to all that Republicans hold dear, reflected instead a not-so-pale carbon copy of the latter’s agenda, focused on terrorism as the magic bullet to hold up in order to frighten the American people, to subdue and quell all resistance to continued intervention abroad, similarly, alternative ways of thinking, governing, living, at home. Ironically, this psychological-ideological message hammered home incessantly is becoming increasingly unnecessary, the Pavlovian response having already been validated.

A Clinton-Trump presidential election in 2016 would represent rock-bottom in the confirmation of America’s desire for continued unilateral global supremacy, a venture by both candidates to the precipice of total war for the sake of national honor (i.e., advanced-capitalist development). The US is largely responsible for the manufacture of terrorism through successive interventions in the Muslim world, only then to use terrorism as an ideological crutch for mounting universal political-economic expansion. The ultimate referent here is American capitalism, on which we can be sure Trump looks with favor, and, in the Democratic debate, we find Clinton using phony rhetoric to mask her own strong commitment to capitalism; for when asked, “Should corporate America love Hillary Clinton?”, she replied, “I want to be the president for the struggling, the striving and the successful”—can’t be done, when the successful are responsible for conditions creating the struggling. Hillary, above class, above party, desperately wanting to be loved by everyone as the formula for class reconciliation, the status quo, and the rule of upper groups. A close relation to Wall Street, clearly on a par with that of Trump, which despite his wealth may view him as unstable and unpredictable, provides her with the bridge for the execution of an aggressive military-foreign policy: little to choose between the two front-running candidates.

The politicization of terrorism by both parties brings McCarthyism up-to-date as 21st Century Americanism. We know ourselves by whom we hate, and who hates us. Ethnocentrism and xenophobia have perhaps never been so prevalent and popular in the American psyche than now, Muslims today in the minds of Americans becoming the equivalent of Jews in the minds of Germans in the 1930s—the demiurge of extermination lying just below the surface of political discourse. From Cruz’s remarks on carpet-bombing to the remainder of the candidates of both parties, we see haste in showing who is fairest (i.e., toughest) of them all in fighting terrorism, a muscular appeal to the public quavering in fear. Patrick Healy, in his New York Times article, “Bernie Sanders Falls Behind in a Race Centered on Security,” (Dec. 19), does not exaggerate in writing, “Americans are more anxious about terrorism than income inequality. They want the government to target the Islamic State more than Wall Street executives and health insurers. All of this plays to Mrs. Clinton’s strengths—not only as a hawkish former secretary of state but also as a savvy politician who follows the public mood.” I briefly alluded to America’s race to the bottom, fear of terrorism greasing the wheels, and one can expect the other candidates, as in the Democratic debate and the Republic roster, to follow suit in a race to catch up or sprint to a glorious finish. The curtain descends on false consciousness, America’s corporate-financial elite smiling in the wings.

DECEMBER 24, 2015

Glad Tidings: To Us, a Fate Is Given

2016 beckons, America burrowing down into political Hell, its constitutional vestiges of freedom neglected and all but shredded, as the presidential campaign moves to a second stage, the first being to weed out and eliminate substantive disagreements between the parties over imperialism, unilateral global dominance, and their home-front complement, xenophobia and ethnocentrism. Whence the source of this structural-ideological Reaction? My nominee is an advanced stage of capitalist development in America senile whose inner workings have created widespread wealth-status-power discrepancies in the domestic context then projected outward through militarism and market-investment expansion as its systemic driving force to preserve a degree of cohesion in the polity, economy, and world position of the US. America is nothing if not overly-synchronized, all three interrelated, mutually dependent, polity shaking down from the mid-19th century into a hierarchical structure, the more class-ridden as it proclaims its own classlessness, economy, reciprocally entwined with class structure, acting as a complement of hierarchy through producing extreme wealth concentration and endemic under-consumption and unemployment among the laboring classes, finally, world position, the object of military-political-ideological striving for power and hoped-for corrective to a congealed capitalism, its hardening arteries premonitorily signaling economic breakdown and depression.

America conceives itself in a life-and-death struggle for survival, hence renewed confrontation (add China to Russia, as the major adversaries) beckoning a New Cold War, hence the tensions in the American mind-set taking the form of a pervasive fear-hysteria over terrorism, the anti-immigrant feeling stoking sub-rosa racialism and/or mistakenly implied radicalism, and a drive for the cleansing spirit of patriotism. Ironically, being on top of the global heap instills anxieties about becoming displaced, which is taken to be the struggle for survival. Exceptionalism gives rise to a paranoia over displacement, thereby driving America further into the rock-bottom of political Hell, present happenings, e.g., drone assassination, covert action, regime change, the war-criminal activities of servicemembers, recently come to light, each typifies the controlled sadism commensurate with maintaining pride of place in the international system and together pointing to an aforementioned senility characteristic of declining Empires.

Santa's sled is laden with lethal weaponry of death. It doesn't have to be this way, Christmas itself even fully secularized has the potential for affirming life through showing consideration for others, particularly the weak and disadvantaged among us, concretely taking the form of a social transformation equalitarian in spirit, character, and condition. But that appears beyond our ken, where hegemony trumps harmony and peace, capitalist social organization with its numerically tiny ruling group trumps commonwealth (savor the word, as the wealth shared in common, including its environmental as well as social-justice significance!), where contempt for privacy via NSA massive surveillance trumps respect for the individual's freedom of thought, political security, and human dignity, and where heavy-handed consumerism trumps a life of the mind and sense of uncluttered purpose. Accordingly, the synchronization is now complete, added to polity, economy, world position, we see war, intervention, and the debasement of the human being into a fear-struck, hate-ridden, agent of destruction aimed at all coming within our purview, perhaps most of all, ourselves.

Too pessimistic for the Holiday Season? Tell that to Obama, who has finessed America into a war-provoking posture under liberal auspices (liberal as, not only resistance to, with intention of destroying, radicalism, in truth, its historical function, but liberal also as the liberalization of proto-fascism, to give the State internal powers of repression, external powers of militarized expansion, and sublime dedication to the fortunes of capitalism itself, through what I have been describing in these pages as the interpenetration of business and government for the promotion of monopolistic self-regulation and greater wealth-concentration)—Obama frankly my villain du jour, more so than Clinton and Trump, because he has dressed a socially inhumane system to which his own measures have contributed mightily with a patina of tarnished gold to cover over the demise of whatever democracy in America remained, both at home and abroad. Wall Street may be an overworked symbol which, worse, has led to simplistic thinking and the consequent remedies affecting the American structure of power, but it will do in a pinch until we take the measure of capitalism's systemic foundations in generating prodigious wealth and ramifying, octopus-like arms reaching into, and corrupting, the heart of the nation's identity as a free people. Morgan, Chase is free, Monsanto is free, the new genre of US arithmetic is free, i.e., billionaires emerging from myriad dung heaps of finance and industry, yet the average Joe or Jane Doakes, in direct correspondence, is NOT free, partly through his/her fault in allowing such a system to arise and cheering it on by endorsing the Obamas, Clintons, Trumps, of this (unseemly) world, but beyond their, really our, passivity, there is a structure of power grinding on, taking full command of what might politely be termed the sources of knowledge and organs of opinion-formation, directed to a fast-enclosing social order. What is to be done?

DECEMBER 25, 2015

Hitlerian Proportions: US Foreign Policy and NATO Expansion

Seldom have I found so cogent and morally bracing geopolitical analysis than in Gary Leupp's CounterPunch article, NATO: Seeking Russia's Destruction Since 1949, (Dec. 25-27), timely in that discussing contemporary international politics in light of the changing world structure, both developments defining a context, 65-plus years in the making, holding the promise of a massive global confrontation, and, even if limited to initial nuclear exchanges and confined to less than apocalyptic dimensions, still wreaking destruction and suffering which intensifies all the other problems confronting humankind. Yet we slumber in our myopic address of issues—understandably compelling to those of us so engaged, notably, global warming, environmental rapine, massive surveillance, structurally- and culturally-bound racism, the widening domestic cleavages of wealth and power—all of which vanish (I should say, evaporate, much as does the human being targeted by a drone) if worse comes to worse. Climate change, not to worry; fracking and devastation of primal forests, ditto; clamping down on dissent, privacy, freedom of association, the same; inequality and discrimination, as night follows day; financial-industrial consolidation and concentration, apple pie, should World War III materialize, with no-one left to mourn the consequences, but even short of that, as now, each of these destructive aspects of present-day decision-making merely accelerates such trends because the permanent-war doctrine operable in ideologically-obsessed government circles takes priority over problems which require solving if, ultimately, global catastrophe of a different but parallel kind is not to happen. In fact, the two are joined, whether war or its near-suicidal preparation, democracy and freedom become kicked into the dustbin of history.

Let's assume the avoidance of total war (for the sake of analysis, if not of historical truth)—Keynes's aphorism, we'll all be dead in the long run, a perceptive if unintentional diagnosis of the results of national policy and systemic expansion—so as to focus on the situation at hand, what one finds is that the US has one-sidedly mounted a global war of dominance (we term it a Cold War, as if to imply America and Russia are equally involved, the former, defensively, the latter, menacing offensively), Russia always the aggressor, fictionalizing the postwar setting to promote the reification of anticommunism as a means of normalizing imperialism, energizing a social climate hostile to labor rights and civil rights, and fomenting an aggressive mental-set as directed to war as a self-fulfilling prophesy. Within five years following the war, the Marshall Plan and Truman Doctrine, the organization of NATO, support of the Kuomintang in China, and transforming the UN into an anti-Soviet coalition, all were symptomatic of America's unilateral quest for supervising the globalization of capitalism on its own terms and to its own advantage. By 1950, the die had been cast, as though a deterministic path to the present, administrations one after the other in cumulative succession regardless of party bifurcating world order that, via military means and internal subversion, societal-ideological tensions could be used to cover the market-and-investment dynamics of US monopoly-capitalist development. But there was nothing actually deterministic about it, and rather the steady procession toward full-throttle expansion feeding on itself.

I say Hitlerian proportions not to indicate size and scope, but the transmogrifying energies to be applied at home and abroad. Every intervention, every stimulus to ideological hysteria, every deposing of a democratic leader, whether in Central America or Iran, still in the early stages of the Cold War (Vietnam signifying a point of no return in America's fascistic vision and version of Exceptionalism, as code for unrestrained/uninhibited right to achieve world counterrevolution), and later, beyond regime change and covert action, every strategic ploy to form either trade or military alliances, with the growing turning of attention to China and the Far East, every use of false-flag operations, on and on, the US, whether at State or Defense, the CIA, Treasury, right up to the Oval Office, Government had become a permanent Situation Room, the effect of all this to alter domestic society to unrecognizable lengths as compared, say, with the New Deal years. Diplomacy was replaced by demonization, rational self-interest by an hegemonic thirst bordering on bloodlust. Hillary has dislodged all-comers as the voice of responsible genocidal practice, i.e., "responsible," also like Obama, because couching domestic repression and foreign war in the seemingly moderate language of liberalism.

NATO is more or less the stalking horse for US global ambitions, its policy of active recruitment, sending out applications for membership at a rate difficult to keep up with, having one purpose, encirclement of Russia, preparatory to its dismemberment, itself prerequisite to all-out assault on China along similar lines, Japan a willing partner in the enterprise. Exceptionalism, time to move over on the ideological pedestal, to make way for Invincibility as a motivating spirit which guides American actions. We see therefore escalation in the historical process of seeking world dominance, a more dangerous Cold War than perhaps ever. (To be accurate, strike "perhaps"). This is a psychological nightmare in the making, projection becoming increasingly important to the outcome: What America says about Russia is a projection of our own aggressive beliefs and plans onto that country (also China). More than a conjuring act, America's addiction to a threat of Evil is very real, grounded in an habitual ethnocentrism which divides the world in terms of We and They, those for us, those against us, an outlook both fueling and fueled by hostility to labor, class as an organizing social principle, and equality, and from a generalized antiradicalism finding expression also today in counterterrorism, a love-relationship to guns, and xenophobic venom toward the immigrant.

It is easy to blame “Neocons” for our troubles (the term is a slur on traditional conservatism, of which America has seen little in its history, Burke probably pilloried if all of his ideas were taken into account)—why not call them what they are, petit fascists? Not the legions of think-tank, NGO, and Senate advocates for war, national honor, etc., prove decisive here, but America qua America has shown itself to be integrally flawed, if peace, social justice, and respect for human dignity be our guiding standard. Even in the short-term context, aid to forces that evolved into Islamic extremists in Afghanistan, in order to counter Russia’s efforts to stabilize the Kabul government in the 1980s, doesn’t get at the immediate global turmoil, for before that the uncritical support of Israel in its project of ethnic cleansing and territorial expansion could not but arouse Muslim anger—the commingling of anticommunism and counterterrorism allowing the US to show the flag, thereby enlarging the war theater to make the Middle East integral to the confrontation with Russia and China. The pieces are falling into place, the 2016 presidential election given the probable candidates an exercise in more of the same: a march to the precipice.

DECEMBER 29, 2015

Israel Disgraces Judaism: Militarism + Orthodoxy = Authoritarian Mindset

Where else in the world is Occupation given a free pass by the global community? Why? Lingering guilt over the Holocaust? Geopolitical reality, in which the US has established a wedge of support for its never-ending confrontation with Russia and China? Oil politics run amuck, where Middle East dominance is a prerequisite for America’s hegemonic plans and aspirations? Or merely, the minutia of power-considerations, from, e.g., AIPAC lobbying to relentless media iteration of a bastion of freedom standing valiantly against the twin evils of Arab nationalism (read, Muslim extremism) and the still-communistic menace of Russia and China (a distorted conjuring of Stalin and Mao)? Take your pick, probably all of the foregoing, for allowing Israel to drop below the moral radar and emerge scot-free as a member of the international community in good standing. And no doubt, other factors I’ve omitted, as in the skillful use of charging opponents, including Jews, with the tar brush of anti-Semitism.

Ganugh, enough already. Judaism is precious to the history of freedom, inscribed in the sublime thoughts of Torah, where persecution had the effect of chastening the ancient Hebrews to welcome and respect the stranger and to feel a special obligation to uphold moral standards through living exemplary lives. This has come down until recent times as a mandate, whether secular or religious, to amplify the gifts of civilization for all humankind as in the contributions made to philosophy, literature, painting, and music—a tangible presence on the world scene that, in the 20th century, could but anger the forces of totalitarianism and mediocrity and lead directly to the Evil of the Holocaust itself. World Jewry paid the penalty for, by its conduct and values, opposing the retrograde forces spawned by the difficulties attendant on the industrial transformation, on which fascism thrived: a manure pile of resentments, conspiracy theory, fears of democratization, the plebeian accommodation to monopoly capitalism as though identifying with The Leadership and with conquest would restore meaning to life.

Because Jews had been, perhaps from time immemorial, the proverbial scapegoat, made their targeting easier, but for that very reason, made their urge toward learning, their enlistment in progressive causes, the more defining and vital to their own lives. Now, I’m saddened, deeply saddened, to write, this is passing away in the mistaken identification with Israel as the source of Jewish essentialness. It is NOT. There is no warrant in Torah for the merciless beating down of an indigenous population whose only “crime” has been inhabitancy of a land the conqueror has claimed—if not a distortion of Zionism, where all could live in peace and harmony, then grounds for exposing Zionism from the start as unwarranted aggression and contrary to the spirit of Jewish cosmopolitanism and the godliness of all human beings. Today, Israel remains on a decades-long rampage of inflicting deprivation and humiliation on the Palestinian people, while inflicting the poisons of hatred and intolerance on itself. We read in today’s paper the Knesset is considering legislation on curbing the influence of NGOs, the fine print being their not our NGOs, the “their” the few peace groups remaining in Israeli society, along with the members wearing identifying symbols in the Knesset (obvious shades of Nazism), while also today Israel is demanding Brazil accept Dan Dayan, archetypal militant settler in the Occupied Territories, as its ambassador to that country.

But today is not different from yesterday, the ever-steady encroachment on the rights of Palestinians, advanced weaponry vs. knives and can openers, the bombardments of areas densely-filled with ordinary families (and hospitals, water-treatment plants, etc.) that we witnessed in Gaza, the checkpoints, the barbed wire, and behind the Israeli soldier’s sunglasses the smugness, contemptuousness, disdain for human life, like controlling so much cattle to market, or a throwback to Nazis herded Jews at bayonet point into the waiting trains for the crematoria. Every Jew who died in the concentration camp and death chamber during World War II is a silent refutation of current Israeli practice; they did not die to confer license on oppressors, or to legitimize oppression. They died, yes, as martyrs, they died as giving testimony to the world of their belief in freedom and for many their devotion to God.

Israel invokes God via the Jewish State as the new Golden Calf, to be worshipped as the guardian of mayhem and murder. Every Palestinian thrown off the land, stomped under foot, wears the face of a Jew herded into the ovens. And Israelis are blind to their own actions, the commission of atrocities, as though having somehow (call it “introjection”) internalized the unspeakable crimes committed against Jews of a previous generation. What is to be done? Can the now-apparent authoritarianism, fast assuming totalitarian proportions, be reversed? I don’t know. I do know, however, the pride I can take in the Judaism that I learned about and experienced in an earlier time. Now somewhat older, I can remember the solidarity expressed between whites and blacks in which Jews were an important part of the civil rights struggle (of which I was privileged to be a foot soldier). I can remember the disproportionate role of Jews in radicalism and the labor movement, and personally claiming Paul Robeson as one of our own. Radicalism is dying in America; it is probably already dead, long buried, and openly vilified in Israel. The two are somehow related, as Israel has absorbed to itself what had been the legacy of American Jewry, only to negate it and leave it empty. My title above, “Israel Disgraces Judaism,” in reality does not go far enough, for it may also be responsible for its decline as a world religion solicitous of the care of all who are persecuted and deprived of their humanity. It therefore not only disgraces Judaism, it negates it, a transmogrification of beauty into ugliness which few among us will have the courage to withstand.

JANUARY 1, 2016

Dynamics of False Consciousness: America Today

Class is integral to capitalism, the former its defining structure, the latter the directed purpose of a societal-historical process of wealth concentration whose intended purpose is systemic inequality. To legitimize this historical formation over time, given its inherent and myriad features of domination, requires persistent, sustaining, effective doses of false consciousness transmitted downward through the social order in the form of patriotism, diversions and distractions, and the invitation to identify with war (hegemony) and expansion (imperialism). This formula of Exceptionalism, the ideological cover for America's special brand of capitalism, has worked in domestic and international politics through formal and informal social control at home and a pattern of aggressive, largely unilateral, combat, intervention, and confrontation in foreign affairs: the full blossoming of capitalist development as a counterrevolutionary force arresting trends toward and possibilities of global democratization, anathema to capitalism and America both.

I say "anathema" because what I am describing did not occur overnight, or even following the Second World War, at which point dramatic policy choices were coming into convergence, as in the squaring off of world ideological systems obstructing the universalization of capitalism led by America. Reaching the heights of power and influence in that war's aftermath then defined a still higher stage, from coalition leadership ("the free world") to exclusive hegemon calling the tune to actions to the US's advantage and on its behalf. There is nothing solely deterministic in history, nor, for that matter, foreordained by a kindly, superseding deity; yet, consecutiveness both in policy and action, rooted in systemic requirements (from the maximization of profits and the creation of surplus capital as a means to further investment, to class dynamics which ensure the security of ruling groups and their potency in decision-making at all levels of government and also ensure, the twin to surplus capital, surplus labor, by means of under-consumption via low-wages doctrine and inequitable sharing of wealth distribution) and exploitation itself.

Nothing new about this, the capitalization of chattel slavery in America, with emancipation, a precursor to a fully elaborated system of wage labor now articulated, by slavery's removal, as part of the uniform growth of specifically modern institutions of law and economics, property-centered, with slavery no longer a structural impediment: capitalism as a runaway locomotive on a single track. But even before plantation slavery had become a decisive factor in the US political economy, we see in the very formation of America the weakening if not abandonment of feudalism as a European relic unsuited for transplanting in the New World, thereby leaving capitalism a clear field unencumbered by political-social restraints to fill out the structural and ideological vacuum created by migration. Purist capitalism from take-off to, now, landing, so historically defined as even to subsume slavery, a premodern formation, ultimately within its capacious maw (yes, that of a voracious carnivore). There were no exceptions allowed, labor, from the start of industrialism, subjected to strikebreaking and state-sponsored violence, and in agriculture, serfdom of a peculiarly capitalist kind, with sharecropping and debt peonage, all in all then, the historical-structural foreclosure of ALTERNATIVES to capitalism, a behemoth which assumed total proportions in molding the culture and politics of society.

A capitalist polity has no need for internal dissent, if it wishes to preserve its monolithic class system. What I described above is represented not by an elite conspiracy, but the sum-total of countless decisions matter-of-factly taken whenever and wherever class prerogatives, decisions of war and peace, trends toward consolidation and monopolization, are opposed or resisted by working people, until finally the latter have become habituated/conditioned to acceptance of the going reality as the normalization of life and of order, a framework within which exclusion from power is compensated for by membership in the club, albeit on a subordinate basis, to engage in the exploitation of others still further down the Great Chain of Being, blacks at home, along with other designated out-groups, and overseas, whether through outsourcing, market-penetration, or war, intervention, or regime change, whole nations and populations, especially peasantries victimized by their own nations' ruling groups. Thus, a never-ending exploitative sequence of power-relations founded on military strength and geopolitical considerations.

We come to today, the fruit of centuries of internal capitalist development, an unprecedented mal-distribution of wealth, a corresponding powerlessness of the mass citizenry, the intensified build-up of military power symbiotically linked to political-strategic goals of financial-industrial-commercial dominance inaugurating a stage of globalization stabilized it is hoped to perfection, as satisfying the dream of permanently freezing into place America's culminating role in world history. An immodest projection? History itself stops at the American shoreline, all else to be the fulfillment of its destiny as the Empire of One. Perhaps think of where we are, beginning a new year, not of hope but of fear, a pervasive fear of terrorism (today, an armed camp in Times Square, and other major cities coast-to-coast), a fear whose source, we dimly realize, has been the actual record of US involvement worldwide, from Cold War conflict with respect to Russia and China and the internal subversion and overthrow of progressive governments and societies, on one hand, to, particularly, intervention in the Middle East on Israel's behalf, then extending outward to Iraq, Syria, Egypt, Iran, all directions that Israel deems a threat to its own superiority and security. The Arab and Muslim nations, themselves saturated with US military bases, are expected to submit to such regional and global dictation, not realizing, on America's part, that resentment follows intervention, a seedbed for terrorism which cannot be eradicated until and unless there is a fundamental change in American policy—and even then the whiff of blowback will remain in the air.

2016 will not usher in a year of peace and freedom. America is too committed, by bipartisan agreement, to a course of sustained aggrandizement, the threat of terror seemingly confirming the need for pressing forward, a domestic climate of narrowing social goals of concentration of wealth and power accompanied by hostility to dissent, a foreign-policy context of unyielding claims to moral virtue as imperialist underpinning and, its concrete expression, demands for military and trade partnerships (TPP, the latest example) directing the world's wealth and resources to America's coffers, and that of its "friends and allies." On crucial matters, here, I hold foreign policy as determinant, there is no difference between the major parties, hence, the upcoming elections an overwhelmingly favorable plebiscite in favor of imperialism and, if need be, war. Trump and Clinton, choose your poison. An end to police racial violence, not when the shadow of ethnocentrism and xenophobia casts a centuries-old pall over the landscape of structural-ideological bigotry. Tax avoidance at the apex of American capitalism, not altered anytime soon. Spoliation of the environment, just ask Oklahoma residents this week about the fracking in their state—or the deeper contemptuous treatment of Nature through pushing to the earth's polar extremities in search of wealth, the ravaging of rain forests, similarly, and the thousand-and-one developmental and extractive schemes with no regard to future generations. Not a happy note on which to extend new year's greetings, except, between the lines, a plea to us all to RESIST.

JANUARY 5, 2016

Legacy Building = Deceit + Chicanery

The Obama record: copious liberal (i.e., negation of progressive) manure-shoveling, combined with a public policy of muscular capitalist development via an unrestrained private economy of monopolism and favorable business/financial regulation and a militaristic international posture of war, intervention, regime change facilitating market expansion and hegemonic security. Not an enviable record, except to an ascending constituency representing core political-ideological proto-fascism defining the increasingly predominant American mentality: the swelling of fear as an outgrowth of massive surveillance at home, counterrevolution abroad, both dressed up as a Manichean global conflict (wholly neglecting the US role in fostering Islamic jihadism) in which counterterrorism slips over neatly into the Cold War construct of anticommunism in order to legitimize the steadily escalating confrontation with Russia and China, itself inaugurating a New Cold War possibly more dangerous than the first.

Reaction (e.g., Bush) is a known factor, while liberalism is equally pernicious because the results are the same, creating a capitalist polity of widely disparate wealth-and-power distribution that immobilizes (while perpetuating) the poor, splits working people along racial and ethnic lines, and solidifies the ranks of upper social groups (providing for inordinate control over political life and policy determination). To a greater extent than previously in peacetime, this translates as a social structure and political economy of systemic inequality promoting by necessity, to keep its growth rate and internal features intact, a sustained pattern of global aggrandizement which, reciprocally meshed with the domestic foundations of business growth, becomes the paradigm of universalized, unilateral dominance in determining an acceptable (to the US) world order. Here Obama is sufficiently proficient to advance the cause, although a neophyte when it comes to geopolitical thinking and planning, assisted by an ironclad heritage tracing back to the late 19th century of the Open Door to establish political-ideological boundaries within which trade expansion underwritten by military power is de rigueur, something he always took as a given and lacked the political imagination to contest. Further assistance has come of course from an authoritative cadre of militarists, State and Treasury “experts,” think-tank regulars, university professors acting as servants of power, together all complicitous in shaping the Grand Design, timeservers in the corporatist organization of American society including its imperialist thrust.

Obama wears ideological blinders, enabling him to put a liberal spin on policy trends verging on power-lust seemingly for its own sake, yet the disguise for a still more deadly amalgam of policy in which power is code for the totalitarian regularization of political-social relations sanctioning a militarized capitalism, itself grounded in ethnocentric/xenophobic values of hierarchy, hatred of dissent, stimulation of patriotism, in sum, command above, docility below. Entering his final year as president, he claims leadership on several fronts, each of which has been turned upside down, leading to a legacy perfectly aligned with that of his predecessors, confirming the unity of both parties on the essentials of capitalism. Government agencies plod on with little to no protection to the public; DOJ is feckless when it comes to police brutality, white-collar crime, antitrust prosecution; the Pentagon is the instrument of aggression, papered over by State and Treasury, one busily negotiating military alliances and trade partnerships (to the same end), the other enlisting, along with State, the services of the IMF and World Bank to protect American investment overseas, the stabilization of credit and currency on a global basis, and the internal arrangements of the targeted “host” countries affecting tariffs, austerity, and the extraction of natural resources; the list continues indefinitely as the normalization of hegemony, no questions asked, no answers—except for pressures and force—freely given.

Obama is therefore simply doing his job as custodian of the supposedly natural order, a cipher awaiting replacement by the next political enabler of advanced capitalism. But if that were all, it would hardly be worth discussion. From cipher to actor, whether conscious or unconscious in assuming the role, we see in foreign policy a mandatory taking of reins, exigencies of capitalism demanding nothing less. Paradoxically, the US finds itself threatened, not by communism as a world historical force (the supreme diagnosis of the unfolding Cold War, from George Kennan to Curtis Le May, in descending orders of sophistication), but by rising capitalist powers, newly minted Russia and China in that respect, as well as the EU acting as a financial-commercial bloc, and Japan, with its feudalistic corporatism. This decentralization of global capitalism is now the ultimate enemy of the US from the standpoint of its exercise of world power, with terrorism, oddly enough, a welcome intrusion because bringing about intracapitalist unity in fighting this threat—a temporary respite, arresting internecine competition while diverting the attention of the masses, particularly in America, from geopolitical tensions engendered by economic rivalry.

I am not here diagramming a Marxist scenario of Nirvana, the collapse of capitalism as a world system, merely instead, what I take to be the US caught in its own destructive framework as the other global powers, because similarly inclined, rather than transcending capitalism altogether for socialism, experience their own capitalist difficulties of underconsumption, falling rates of profit, the need for social control of the masses to smother discontent, thus a tightly organized society locked into struggling performance and further conflict. If anything, Marx missed the boat on the systemic evolutionary progression of human betterment, underestimating just how resourceful capitalism can be, fortified by militarism, the (false) promises of consumerism, and a command structure habituating the masses to a state of acquiescence. In this light, terrorism keeps the people in line, even to the extent of distrusting each other, and then methodically dispatched until a new scapegoat can be suitably demonized and vanquished. This becomes, as the condition of capitalist survival, a never-ending process of scapegoating, accompanied by an equally never-ending process of war and intervention, lest, still keeping capitalist rivals in their place, radicalism breaks out of its narcotic state and resumes class struggle, reviving Marx from his ideological slumber.

For now, Obama has a full (counterrevolutionary) plate, North Africa being the latest in a series of testing the waters for areas of vulnerability in establishing the American Imperium. This is in the nature of marginalia, however, because Russia and China occupy American policy makers' primary attention, his own near-obsession with the US domination of Asia, carrying Pentagon and State with him, an important thread of his legacy-construction. India may be the forgotten major player in the region, a potential obstacle to running roughshod in the area as a whole. Russia, meanwhile, awaits a "pivot" of its own, assuming America can build a military edifice sufficient to the task, the present conflict in Syria and the Middle East an obvious flash point in allowing the US to move more "assets"—thank you, Pentagon jargon—to Russia's borders as it is also doing in the Pacific. By moving up the State of the Union address by two weeks, Obama is displaying his commander-in-chief image, a firm, resolute leader, protector of the Homeland, which signifies: more power to the banks and corporations, less tolerance of dissent, a society poised for the next round of global conquest. Much else is cast by the wayside, from the social safety net to the environment, a toning-up for warlike prowess. Let the perpetrated hoax of a democratic society continue, the screws on the other hand tightening rapidly on its opposite, authentic political-social democracy.

JANUARY 6, 2016

Gun Violence: Obama's Best Shot

Obama's best shot is pathetic—and wholly to be expected. For what is gun violence, but the miniaturization of US foreign policy combined with ages-old treatment of the human being as a commodity under capitalism? That is, human life is cheap, whether as the target of drone assassination (Obama) or the contemptuous regard for working people, particularly people of color, in US political-labor history. Today America is the mirror image of its international and domestic barbarism: how expect the sacredness of human life when the societal context glorifies deeds of violence, including the serial raping of the environment. Capitalism teaches antagonism, power, combativeness; contemporary American politics, both parties together, synchronized, on war, intervention, duplicitous merchandising, glorification of wealth, a stew of ruthless egotism enlarged to Cyclopean proportions consistently vented as aggression licensed by religion through dichotomization of social relations into the strong and the weak. Guns merely validate and carry to a logical conclusion the stifled hatred/fear/mistrust bred in the bones of this historical social order. Collective extermination has been America's watchword, whether the Plains Indians in the Middle West, railroad strikers in 1877 at the hands of Pinkertons and militias, Bonus Marchers on the Anacostia Flats, Douglas MacArthur looking on, or the village of My Lai in Vietnam—a blood-stained record every schoolchild is encouraged to take pride in. Excessive patriotism = gun violence, or rather, subliminally justifies gun violence: ask any NRA member; better yet, the average American, as gun sales blow through the roof.

Wiseacres may see guns as an in-depth manifestation of penis envy, but why invoke Freudian psychology when there are evident sources for the shaping of the American personality formation. In 1950, Theodor Adorno et. al. called it The Authoritarian Personality, a polite, overly-generous designation for the fascist mindset (and indeed, the authors used what they termed the f-scale to refine the thematic content of such a mindset). Fascism is alive and well, now in southeastern Oregon, but also the mayoral office in Chicago, the Situation Room in the White House, and countless points in-between, in every counting house like Goldman Sachs or Morgan Chase to every defense contractor like Boeing, and the list goes on! Is there still an honest buck to be made out there? Has Monsanto seen the light? Why, then, expect anyone else to behave differently, beginning with Obama himself? Stand in my way—bang. Challenge my uniform—bang. Look a bit out of the ordinary (what in my day was called scuzzy)—bang. Bang, the answer to everything, a society fast draining of affect, except that which reinforces hatred and fear of difference.

Gun holders were once associated in the popular mind with gangsters and thugs, now with generals, Rotarians, and other good, wholesome citizens, the common denominator among them being, guns transformed the individual into a wielder of power—and power is the basic coinage of the realm, that which allows one to push another around or reduce that person to subservience, the Other to be confronted by the mental shorthand, what's in it for me? Guns confirm the existence and pervasive state of ALIENATION, human separation the rule, violence a life force, not to bridge, but destroy, connectedness, a cheapening of others to repel thoughts of our own desolation and emptiness. Yes, Obama, the right one to personify and presumably wield power over us (for he is truly a fake, the artful dodger as a consolidated ruling group is taking form and cohesion to that end, no longer as in Junker Germany the marriage of Iron and Rye, and instead here the marriage of Wealth and the Military), for as president he has finessed every important issue, including gun violence, widening the already existing social vacuum, and thus allowing, even enabling, crypto-fascist forces to fill in its content. Gun violence will not be diminished until the legitimated violence (Barrington Moore's emphasis, in Social Origins of Dictatorship and Democracy, published 50 years ago, and very much relevant for our time) of business and government finally ceases. Nations often practice legitimated violence on each other through policies of systematic starvation, and more generally for the US at the point of a gun. What legitimates violence is Authority, it is all so nice and legal, it emanates from above, literally and figuratively like drone assassination. No-one to blame, the majesty of the law, in which case Obama by his recommendations does not scratch the surface.

Gun control is a misnomer, although all that the ideological traffic will bear in the year of our Lord 2016, because what is “controlled” is not supply, and much less of course the underlying disposition to violence in the nation at large, but only the pro forma observance of background checks and, in a few states, prohibitions on concealed weapons. Frills and flounces to make liberals feel good, as they, among the rest, actively plan and execute policies of political murder on the Other, stripped of human identity, penalized because standing in the way of (business-financial) progress. If Obama seriously wanted to burnish his legacy, he would rise up in wrath and confront every area which nourishes violence, from foreign hegemonic adventurism and a worldwide network of military bases to an armaments budget choking off the social welfare to everyday brutality of the police, including unpunished killings, of blacks. If he were serious about anything socially decent, he would come out from hiding, erase the bonds of complicity he established from day 1 with every retrograde sector, from banking to pharmaceuticals, and from the elephant on everyone’s back, an antidemocratic Security State, the climate of massive surveillance being one aspect of the wider militarism tearing out the heart of what democracy still remains. Obama’s best shot is not to gun violence but to the solar plexus of a humanity starved for peace and freedom. His recommendations announced on 1/6 have little more than processing regulations—proper licensing for dealers, background checks for customers, details that however emotional his display of tears over children’s murders, will not hack it in the real world.

JANUARY 7, 2016

Pierre Boulez, An Appreciation: Music and Revolution

Sometimes revolutions can be thought of as incremental, harbingers of change down the road, as well as, ordinarily, cataclysmic, resulting in the fundamental alteration of the social order. In this case, Boulez is not Marx, Lenin, or Rosa Luxemburg; he deals instead with nonlethal, barely discriminable attacks on the existing order. Yet for me that is enough because I cherish protean and seminal expression as introducing new sonorities to humankind, capable perhaps of assault on existing patterns of thought, then leading to undermining the social structure itself, based as it is on monolithic, rigid acceptances of order, power, and wealth. I say “perhaps,” because it appears hopeless that aesthetics can be a transformative force doing battle with ruling groups themselves backed by the majesty and armed might of the State in defense of the status quo. So you might think me somewhat deranged when I say that whatever throws a wrench into the tightly-woven mode of consciousness should be honored and encouraged for loosening bonds of passivity and servility, even though not directly culminating in action, but I am buoyed by the hope that aesthetics, for a start, will merge with radical practice in exposing the iron cage in which capitalism has consigned us as the condition of its stability and security.

Boulez does that. He may be indifferent to ideology, but his musical compositions strive for the utmost clarity, a blinding absolutism of honesty, the very consciousness which is SUBVERSIVE to every form of deception and accommodation to reality. A new language, as in his masterwork, Pli Selon Pli, negates accepted/conventional meanings, now precision coupled, however, with a nonassimilable mysticism using as his text the poetry of Stephan Mallarme: mind-blowing to all who care to listen, and to take away, as I did on first hearing, rebellious feelings of courage to penetrate beneath the surface of accepted truths, stepping back on one foot, viewing society from a different angle. (Of course I was already a radical, but this was like opening a new door, the world of self-examination and, I hope, selfless creation: creativity as thumbing one's nose at capitalism and its goal of creating mental paralysis among its subjects.) Thought is subversive, clarity is subversive, searching for epistemological freedom is especially subversive, denying in all cases consumerism, invidious human distinctions (usually over class, property, and wealth), and the morality of war.

Boulez died on January 5, and NYT and the Guardian had informed obituaries the next day, but largely neglected Pli Selon Pli and thus failed to probe the underlying power of his work (though doing justice to his career as a conductor, itself beckoning new horizons). Still, what does all of this have to do with radicalism, much less revolution? Any shattering of mental imprisonment in established forms is worth considering. (The deaths of Paul Bley and Elizabeth Swados also were announced the same day, both of whom contributed to the same discombobulation of the reigning consciousness from their own respective art forms—a testimony to the ferment still operating in society.) The historical trick is to recognize, cultivate, and strengthen what is believed deviant; no, if the idea of an avant-garde at the barricades seems foolish, particularly from the vantage point of the unemployed and wider underclass in America and elsewhere, I take this as evidence of society's hell-bent determination to suffocate all dissent, any grasp of alternative systems, the eradication of implosive poetry, as with Mallarme, evidences direct or indirect of independence, standing tall, affirming the right to achieve full human potentiality.

Here poetry matches poetry. (Boulez employs sporadic interventions of the text but presents its musical equivalent, an extraordinary challenge which suggests to me the liberation of the human mind.) Pli Selon Pli, or “fold according to fold,” describes Bruges, in the words of The Gramophone, as “emerging from dissolving mists,” the result a mind-stretching kaleidoscope of elements, that combination of being precise yet mystical, what I sense to be breathtakingly metaphysical and transcendent driving forward—something not easily contained by the captive mind of the status quo. Again The Gramophone: “Its constant shifting on several levels simultaneously is suggestive of a labyrinth wherein colours, motions, shapes are endlessly transformed.” Boulez himself refers to matching music and text: “They [musical quotations] are not literal, but abstracted from their context, displaced; they are like glimpses into the future. The enunciation of the initial poem is, on the contrary, extremely simple, clear, direct and syllabic.” This is not John Reed glimpsing the future, and declaring it is ours, but the future is nevertheless implicit in form, text, and structure—what in my cherished dream would be the anticipation of things to come, world democratization.

Like the composer, the poet from which he draws inspiration, the orchestra (I was privileged to hear it performed in London by the B.B.C. Symphony Orchestra, Boulez conducting), and for our purposes the listener, one feels the intensity of the whole, as if were it only possible that music could be harnessed to explosive forces of change societal transformation would be close by, in reach. Pierre, R.I.P. It is unfair to burden you with our problems, militarism dwarfing creativity, capitalism distorting human personality, a culture of bread and circuses pulverizing subtleties of thought and observation. You kept the faith, preserving a white-hot intelligence in the face of every effort, as a product of advanced capitalism, to keep our collective heads above water and not be reduced to authoritarian submission.

JANUARY 8, 2016

Netanyahu: Rabin's Murderer?

Political murder is a special case of homicide, often collective, as in crimes against humanity, rather than individual, although assassination comes under this heading. I am not referring to acts of violence associated with robbery, heated disputes, or revenge, but something systemic, regularized, ideally, from the culprit's standpoint, bureaucratized, to hide specific responsibility and involvement. The one who gives the orders is as much implicated as the one who pulls the trigger, possibly more so when command incites to execution, the latter less likely otherwise. Example: Obama has murdered countless individuals through drone assassination, even had he not pored over candidate-lists in the Situation Room. Approval is given, all systems go (!), as his orders are transmitted to operators, like him, thousands of miles from the scene, themselves in comfortable surroundings, playing God to unsuspecting victims. (Today's NYT, 1-7-15, reports these remote-control assassins are receiving full military honors for their work.) War crimes are best perpetrated when hidden from view; ditto, the murder of individual political leaders.

Enter Netanyahu into the discussion. PBS's "Frontline" this week traced his rise and political career, and notwithstanding the usual gaggle of apologists for Israeli policies, e.g., Dennis Ross and Martin Indyck, as well as Netanyahu's own advisers, one sees a compelling narrative of the Rightward drift of Israel's politics, including scenes of outright fanaticism in which a tumultuous crowd is gathered protesting the Oslo Accords. Netanyahu is not haranguing the crowd from the speakers' balcony looking down; rather, he is one more face in the crowd, quite relaxed and evidently pleased at the furor created. What do I make of the scene? Quite simply, Netanyahu did nothing to stop the demonstration. Why should he, he was entirely in agreement with it. Here is a leader who uncorks the bottle, the vitriol pouring out; the leader whose consistent hardline agitation over at least two decades shapes the political-ideological environment for extremism, and, no surprise, much of the Israeli public responds favorably.

This is the context for Rabin's murder. To rephrase, one who pulls the trigger is of secondary importance; even giving the command is not point-specific to culpability when, as here, political hysteria is whipped up so as to become integral to the Israeli political structure, so that a lone gunman no more than identifies and personifies the collective murderous intent to be directed against internal critics and dissenters as themselves somehow transvalued into terrorists and assassins. This hardly lets Netanyahu off the hook: his methodical coldness in discrediting all opposition, matched by an equal coldness in the arbitrary shelling of population-dense Gaza and summary put-down of rock-throwing youth facing colossal military force, is at one with the fate of Rabin, himself no Liberator of the Palestinian people, yet portrayed as, if this were the Christian equivalent, the arch anti-Christ, an Enemy of the People, thus fair game for execution via mob psychology by an enraged public.

Netanyahu did not pull the trigger; Israel did. But history will not absolve him, his actions both before and since making clear, corresponding to his ability to turn out massive demonstrations, control Knesset policy (as in making representatives of peace groups wear identifying marks), and rejection of elementary civil liberties, that the very concept of “extremism” is a misnomer in Israeli society. There are not extremists when in fact at least two-thirds of Israeli citizens are extreme in their dedication to ethnic cleansing, one Jerusalem, xenophobic dimensions attached to the notion of the Jewish State itself—the society is extremist, not the ultra-Orthodox on whom the label is bestowed. Gradations are arbitrary, designed to exonerate the established leadership and its militaristic foundations. This may seem a long way from MIT and Netanyahu’s sojourn in America, yet his carefully planned rise to power does not miss a beat—and his acceptance by the Israeli electorate, a damning indictment of its war-proclivities and national cult of superiority. Rabin was a soldier, but he showed softness when he sought peace (to be equated with weakness and wholly unacceptable to an Israeli public, peace undermining the prototypic ego-structure on display without let-up.)

Is criticism such as the foregoing anti-Semitic? Judaism unnecessarily recapitulates the horrors of the Holocaust, demonstrating to itself the psychological security that comes from blaring to the world an ethos of strength, power, violence—all reprehensible to a Jewish faith in humanity that I admire and try to live by. Let the goyim engage in assassination, what happened to Rabin a quadruple affront to Jehovah. Netanyahu is the anti-Moses, Israeli Jews the Philistines who defy the Mosaic law at every turn. And American Jews slavishly go along, ignoring their long history in this country, until recently, of devotion to progressive and radical causes, reaching out the arm of friendship, indeed solidarity, to blacks, industrial workers, union membership of all kinds, and to the dispossessed in need of representation. This was always a proud heritage of dissent, bearing, like the Rosenbergs, the brunt of anticommunism, and like Schwerner and Goodman, along with their friend Cheney, the brunt of racial injustice and hatred. Perhaps Israelis should rethink their Jewishness, and discover the beauties of justice and peace and respect for the human soul. Fat chance, however, in the present state of affairs.

JANUARY 11, 2016

Domestic-Foreign Policy Integration: Gun Control/North Korea

In theory, all things are, or seemingly appear, interrelated, however dissimilar they may be, as though human activities and events are causally bound together (the historical aphorism about Cleopatra's nose that E.H. Carr mentions), but arcane as that is, we need no special divination to spot the relationship between gun control in America and US policy toward North Korea, for both existential problems stem from a common source: advanced capitalism here particularized through policies brought up to date by Obama's global adventurism and the nation's supporting militarism implementing war, intervention, regime change, and—our separate phenomena now conjoined—the celebration of the cult of violence. America is a boiling cauldron, the twisted logic of dominance (over others), spoliation (of the environment), and possessiveness (erection of the property right as a supreme deity governing class, status, and power in society), together defining the national spirit of hate, greed, fear, above all, conquest, has rendered consistent the inner workings and mentalset of a political-ideological structure geared to contempt for human dignity at home, international peace abroad. We have become a society of warrior-strangers, first, to each other, and then, casting around, to any who dare question our judgment, cross our path, reject our blandishments, or deny our moral purposes and rectitude.

Call it Exceptionalism if you want, but what gives America the right to arrogate to itself the chief role in ordering the global system, using force when necessary (which seems to be more often the case), and with North Korea, going further, to demonize and isolate the Enemy as the basis for its submission to the American will, is exactly the same driving force and set of assumptions at the heart of US gun violence: the braggart, the bully, the despoiler, the outsider, constantly reminded that violence is the key to self-respect (by towering over others), the gun merely the reconciler of status and power, the instrument of aggrandizement in a social order that values besting one another as the true test of character and moral worth. We do to each other what we would like to do to the North Koreans, blast them off the planet in a fit of pique, whether because of an imagined slight or because the Other sees through us, penetrates our defenses, calls our bluff of virtue incarnate.

No, I do not apologize for gun violence; just the reverse, condemning it as the big-shotism (pun not intended) bred-in-the-bone of capitalist social relations. For every crime committed, from murder to bank robbery to individual holdup, etc., through the use of a gun, we see operating the gnawing desire to become a “somebody” (I think of Robert E. Sherwood’s description in his “Roosevelt and Hopkins” of street kids on New York’s Lower East Side who stand in silence in reverence at the news that Dutch Schultz or some other gangster had been slain), a respect that otherwise is denied to all but the affluent and respectable under a capitalist system that denies the universality of human rights and dignity. Even the aforementioned crimes, the gangster phenomenon, would be negligible in a framework predicated on authentic social and economic democracy, where one neither suffers want nor constantly must prove himself/herself. The real source of gun violence is not poverty, but the distorted pictures and narratives implanted from very early in the American mind, where property (in itself coveted under these conditions) is the bridge to superiority, and, projected outward, the selfsame superiority is a battering ram to cram down the throats of others (North Korea here the quintessential scapegoat perhaps for reasons, unlike its neighbor to the South, of noncompliance with American-defined capitalist orthodoxies) the militarized paradigm of market penetration, trade expansion, and unbounded investment opportunities—not coincidentally, the heart of Obama’s Trans-Pacific Partnership, with the added element of encircling and attempting to isolate (if not also somehow subjugate) China in the process.

Gun violence in America is the normalization of American policy in general, and foreign policy more particularly, in both areas pointing to the glorification of invidious distinction underlined by the moral sanction of superior-inferior social relations, whether of wealth, race, or political influence, indeed, a structural dichotomization prevailing through every aspect of society. In all of this, Veblen was more than a century ahead of his time, from Theory of the Leisure Class to Imperial Germany an insight into capitalism’s powers of human and national separation, a thirst in both cases for recognition, the aforementioned big-shotism believed thwarted from without. The place of militarism as contributing mightily to hierarchy in all its manifestations—individual wealth, national hegemony in international politics—provides a unifying experience for relating domestic gun violence to the dominance over/containment of North Korea. Pyongyang is like Detroit or Chicago’s South Side, if not to be squashed down or eradicated, at least to know its place in the hierarchical framework of truth and virtue, i.e., at the bottom. America busily steps on whatever it disapproves of, an ideological-mental climate which handily separates gangsters who kill at the point of a gun, from law-and-order Authority which also kills at the point of a gun (current police brutality being entirely legitimate, few questions asked, and accounting for its full share of gun violence).

One wonders, would respectful treatment of individuals’ rights, and the toning down of profit-seeking and invidiousness, have yielded different outcomes with respect to both crime and the wild proliferation of weaponry in America? Would skull-bashing of striking workers by federal troops, state militias, local police, and private detective agencies, had they never occurred, in a hospitable context for labor rights, resulted in different outcomes with respect to popularizing and legitimating the use of force as a class weapon in defining labor’s place in America? The nation got off on the wrong foot very early, making the historical emphasis on gun rights both understandable and perfectly acceptable; for every criminal taking lives and money at gunpoint, there are many more packing weapons—in some states, unconcealed – to test their self-identity as Bunyanesque salt-of-the-earth moral enforcers of the American way. From putting down slave revolts before the Civil War, to intimidating whomever appeared different or thought differently in our day, the gun was a useful appendage, code for patriotism and antiradicalism, in the enforcement of that way of life: property, preclusive of whom to exclude from the folk community of capitalism, and casting the view outward, demanding, yes, demanding (as in the case of North Korea) compulsory respect for, and absolute acceptance of, that very way of life.

***

Let's turn first to Obama's op-ed piece in NYT, January 8, entitled, "Barack Obama: Guns Are Our Shared Responsibility," a holier-than-thou plea for less than effective gun control which is wholly contradicted by his own and his administration's record of massive killings in foreign lands while doing little to stem the violence at home. Lest my point on this be not emphasized enough, the two are closely related, in that legitimated killings abroad sanction and habituate the American public to the depersonalization of death at home—legitimation as the product of established authority, giving violence a head-start to all claimants of moral rightness, including a financial system that practices violence by driving some into poverty while rewarding others with staggering wealth, as well as the now common-variety of violence, shooting down young blacks in the spirit of impunity. (The badge is handed out by God.) Carpet bombing, torture, intervention per se, all have their effect on the domestic psyche, breeding lawlessness under the umbrella of law—or for corporations, also the same. Our home generals, deserving respect, are the pharmaceutical CEOs, hedge fund operators, media personalities, all dishing out class weapons (pens and microphones replacing guns) to maintain hierarchy, militarism, obliteration of personal autonomy, in place. Anything less is presumably an invitation to terrorism (Israel already labeling dissidents and opponents of the reigning coalition as terrorists, America, as in the innuendoes trotted out in the present campaign, not far behind).

Obama's umbrella, "common-sense gun reform," is farcical; he throws in the towel even before he starts. After correctly declaring, "The epidemic of gun violence in our country is a crisis. Gun deaths and injuries constitute one of the greatest threats to public health and to the safety of the American people," he now retreats: "A national crisis like this demands a national response. Reducing gun violence will be hard. It won't happen during my presidency." Obama spreads out the national response; rather than bearing down—as did FDR when he addressed poverty and unemployment specifically through using the power of the federal government—he calls on a feel-good participation accomplishing nothing (even the private sector a valued ally): "Still, there are steps we can take now to save lives. And all of us—at every level of government, in the private sector and as citizens—have to do our part." Thus: "We all have a responsibility."

But we don't have a responsibility to cease war, intervention, regime change, or paramilitary operations and drone assassination, among "citizens" a nonstarter when it comes to public policy and government boundaries on achieving positive social change. Responsibility is a limited goal designed not to interfere with the foregoing policy-characteristics, themselves, as I've argued, contributory factors to the acceptance and approval of violence itself. A nation up to its neck in displaying force (as through NATO at the Russian border or in carrier battle-groups in the South China Sea) cannot but reinforce gun rights and a gun culture at home, the current swagger in Oregon not unlike the swagger in US military bases worldwide. A nation at peace, having equitable wealth distribution, and assigning responsibility to government for achieving the health and well-being of its citizens, is not likely to have the problem of gun violence. Yet Obama prattles on, oblivious—given how far a gun culture, and its psychological attributes of disdain for human life, has penetrated defensive layers of self-justification to the heart of the American Mind—that he is mouthing platitudes (or worse, knowing he is) which ensure that neither regulation at home nor inspiration from America’s conduct abroad will have changed, a tawdry record of complicity and deception favoring the mentality of combativeness good for the functioning of capitalism.

In the face of US global imperialism, his gun-reforms at home are mealy-mouthed at best: “They [recommendations on January 5] include making sure that anybody engaged in the business of selling firearms conducts background checks, expanding access to mental health treatment and improving gun safety technology.” National crisis; by his own admission, modest expected gains: “These actions won’t prevent every act of violence, or save every human life—but if even one life is spared, they will be well worth the effort.” Obama means business, as in this widely quoted passage: “I will not campaign for, vote for or support any candidate, even in my own party, who does not support common-sense gun reform.” I.e., personal involvement sets an example; structural-legal obstruction of gun manufacture and distribution is postponed indefinitely. He appeals to “the vast majority of responsible gun owners” to do the right thing, specifics not mentioned. Ditto, the “gun industry,” which should be encouraged to meet, like the producers of “consumer goods,” the “high standards to keep our families and communities safe.” Guns become a special case of consumer goods, not lethal instruments of human harm and societal breakdown: “Cars have to meet safety and emissions requirements. Food has to be clean and safe. We will not end the cycle of gun violence until we demand that the gun industry take simple actions to make the product safer as well.” Don’t eliminate guns, give them safety catches; he rounds out the passage: “If a child can’t open a bottle of aspirin, we should also make sure she can’t pull the trigger of a gun.”

This marks the trivialization in safeguarding against gun violence. Still, the industry and its lobby remain uncooperative, and their obstruction is backed by Congress—Obama rightly complaining, “They’ve guaranteed that manufacturers enjoy virtual immunity from lawsuits, which means that they can sell lethal products and rarely face consequences,” but then dips into his box of clichés by creating a false analogy between guns and car seats. “As parents,” he writes, “we wouldn’t put up with this if we were talking about family car seats. Why should we tolerate it for products—guns—that kill so many children each year?” One devoutly wishes for better car seats, but until government focuses directly on guns, their deadly character per se, action is diverted from requisite steps bringing them under direct supervision, control, drastic reduction in the polity. Obama wants manufacturers “to make guns smarter and safer,” as in the development of “microstamping for ammunition,” which neither touches on their supply, lethality, or availability. Stand firm, Americans: “demand leaders brave enough to stand up to the gun lobby’s lies,” and get “governors, mayors and our representatives in Congress [to] do their part.” Gun-control issues merge with the body of great social issues of Liberal America, at the pace expected of liberalism—slow, modulated, expressly rendered nonradical: “Change will be hard. It won’t happen overnight. But securing a woman’s right to vote didn’t happen overnight. The liberation of African-Americans didn’t happen overnight. Advancing the rights of lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender Americans has taken decades’ worth of work.” He pulls out all the stops: “Those moments represent American democracy, and the American people, at our best.” Meanwhile, wars continue, munitions factories go full tilt, arms exports to dictators the same, nothing truly ventured nothing gained—quite typical of Obama.

My New York Times Comment to the Obama op-ed article, same date, (submitted, yet despite my being a regular contributor, the green check mark, it is then rejected, i.e., placed under the censor's axe by NYT, no doubt because controversial) follows:

"I will not campaign for...." Let me hear, "I will not mercilessly bomb innocent civilians through drone assassination." Let me hear, a halt to war, intervention, regime change. Let me hear, the social safety net is tattered, I will drastically reduce the military budget and take care of human needs. In other words, Obama stands side-by-side with the murderers of our time. (If this is too strong for NYT, let them censor it.) There is a direct correlation between gun violence in America and America's gun violence with respect to the rest of the world. Barrington Moore would have called this, "legitimated violence," that which is done from above by Authority on behalf of law and order (or fill in the blank, so long as it supports upper-groups' business and military agendas).

Others have noted Obama's crocodile tears when tragedy strikes. He doesn't display them when he backs rightist regimes who kill indiscriminately, only when, as now, it is advantageous to do so. And on foreign policy he has dragged a not-very-struggling Democratic party along with him, so that Hillary and Bernie are not very different on US hegemonic claims and not very different from their Republican rivals.

America will remain violent because it thinks violently, cultivates violence as a sign of national strength, luxuriates in violence as testimony to its unblemished moral character. Away with such phoniness. Obama can sleep at night because he is well-habituated to the killings he has ordered.

Finally, we find the worship of violence, as essential to advanced-capitalist development for its continued growth both at home and abroad, preventing domestic stagnation and unemployment while also energizing and providing the military clout for global market penetration and investment, directly relevant to interventionist policies addressed to the neutralization of North Korea because, as noted above, of its noncompliance with US-defined capitalist orthodoxies. North Korea has committed the cardinal sin, which is interference with (and perhaps seeing through the follies of) American Exceptionalism, an expansionist quest which brooks no opposition. Violence becomes the midwife of US global dominance, creating the integration of domestic and foreign policy, a congruence of purpose in which beating down North Korea, as one example of many over the years, keeps the xenophobic-ethnocentric mentalset at home sharply tuned, ready to spring. The foremost imperialist power in the world cannot expect less of itself if it is going to manifest the strength to stay on top, let alone survive, in the face of ascending rivals, notably China, which, not by chance, is North Korea's protector. In US policymaking circles, to contain and weaken North Korea is to strike at China.

We note then the ethics (or lack thereof) of superiority, consistent with the treatment of every other point of intervention and regime change: a rigid conception of national security that corresponds to an equally rigid psychological framework of holding the line at all costs—the domino theory alive and well in the year of our Lord 2016. Here I turn briefly to David Sanger and Choe Sang-Hun's Times article, "U.S. Prods China on North Korea, Saying Soft Approach Has Failed," January 8, never mind since 1950 the approach has not been soft, Pyongyang a particularly hated target in an evolving all-purpose Asia policy having China, India, and Afghanistan in mind.

The hermit kingdom couldn't break out of its isolation even if it wanted to. To put a fine point on matters, US contempt for and opposition to North Korea was not only psychological or ideological, but also had to do with market expansion and the spread of capitalism, not there, of course, although South Korea and Japan were showcases of the American Way, but widening the region of US enterprise as a whole, knocking down all barriers, and thus reviving the dream and actuality of the Open Door policy of the latter 19th century.

Angered by the North's nuclear test earlier in the week, America's first response was to blame China. The reporters write: "In a striking public rebuke of China, Secretary of State John Kerry warned Beijing on Thursday [January 7] that its effort to rein in North Korea had been a failure and that something had to change in its handling of the isolated country it has supported for the past six decades." Sanger-Choe parrot State Department belligerence, quoting Kerry's demanding/accusatory statement to Wang Yi of the Chinese foreign ministry without comment as to America's claims to define and supervise affairs in the region: "China had a particular approach that it wanted to make, and we agreed and respected to give them space to be able to implement that. Today in my conversation with the Chinese I made it clear: That has not worked, and we cannot continue business as usual." Always "we," we agreed, we gave them space, we no longer can tolerate the situation—I'm sorry but who the hell are WE either to control North Korea or tell China what to do?!

There follows the usual, squeeze the North still further, until they cry uncle (Sam). Thus: "Two administration officials said the United States was now drafting a proposed resolution for United Nations Security Council approval that would impose sanctions on North Korean trade and finance, including a partial ban on permitting North Korean ships to enter ports around the world, an effort to cut off more of the country's trade." Not enough? Go further: "A second set of sanctions under consideration is a cutoff of North Korean banking relationships, similar to the restrictions placed on Iran in the successful effort to drive it to the negotiation table on its nuclear program." (This goes beyond Bush II's sanctions regime on banking, which his administration "eventually ... relented [on] and lifted ... in part because of pressure from the government then in place in South Korea." Hence, Obama the more doctrinaire ideologue of the two, at least in this case.) Still not enough, Sanger-Choe continue the account: "The most effective step against North Korea, most experts believe, would be the one that the Chinese most oppose: a restriction or cutoff of oil exports to the North. The country is highly dependent on oil that runs through a small number of pipelines from China." Again, America seeks to exercise a supervising/supervening role in the internal life of another country, and between the lines engage in pushback against China.

The sanctions regime appears less harmful or destructive than military intervention, and passes for a more enlightened, albeit sophisticated, response, but this is mistaken, not only because sanctions cause human privation (North Korea is today's Gaza, Gaza, about the same time, yesterday's North Korea), but also because for the implementation of sanctions the military is not far behind. Sanger-Choe write: "The United States Pacific Command met on Thursday to take up other, if largely symbolic [are they kidding?] steps. One is an overflight of the border between North and South Korea with a nuclear-capable bomber, the B-52 or the B-2." In addition, throw in a missile shield, hardly defensive in character. They write further: "South Korean and American officials said there was also renewed discussion of deploying an advanced missile defense system [really, like the NATO-based "defense" system facing Russia], called the Thaad for Terminal High-Altitude Area Defense, in South Korea.” But here, reality sets in; the geopolitical world is changing. South Korea can no longer be relied on to be the abject ally, dependable partner, of America. Economic tides, despite Obama’s Trans-Pacific Partnership, are shifting: “The United States has been pressing for such a deployment for some time, but the South has resisted, largely because of opposition from China, which is the South’s leading trade partner.”

Not only is China making inroads in Latin America, and besting America in Africa, but now is doing the same in its own backyard—driving Obama, his administration, etc., into even greater defiance with respect to North Korea, the brave soldier with his finger in the dike to plug the hole through which US influence is gradually seeping out. North Korea, time to make a decisive stand and in doing so whet Americans’ appetite, already in an advanced state of conditioning, for violence, its helpmate, and for militarism, its contributory matrix, capitalism, a boost up necessary for business as usual.

My New York Times Comment to the Sanger-Choe article (this one published), same date, follows:

Economic strangulation, overflights by nuclear-capable B-52s and B-2s, that will show those Commies who’s boss in (and over) the world system. “...we cannot continue business as usual.” We... this, we... that: everything we, as though holding a God-given mandate to shape and determine Asian and indeed global history, structures, cultures. Kerry comes off poorly here, perhaps as usual, because he is merely the implementer of US hegemonic foreign policy.

Political chutzpah with respect to China and South Korea, enlisting their support for regime change which would destabilize the region as the least of the problems raised, as well as being none of our business (as usual). American dictation of global affairs is coming to an end, either that or the biggest conflagration yet—which the US foreign-policy establishment appears unconsciously to welcome. Thanatosean America on the march, its death wish forcibly extended to all others because, largely, an empty civilization of war, regime change, and unabashed consumerism leaves a moral void in the pit of America’s stomach.

China will not consent to go along with the more outrageous “solutions” to North Korea’s international conduct, in part because it recognizes that the West is responsible for driving North Korea into isolation. The we shall do this, do that ethos is catching up with America, Obama’s Trans-Pacific Partnership to encircle and perhaps eventually dismember (doesn’t the US wish!) China not helping matters.

JANUARY 13, 2016

Privatization: National Descent into Hell

One does not have to be a Marxist to say that property in our times, i.e., in a system of modern capitalism, is a curse on human intelligence and the endeavor to lead a meaningful life when it has been set against the concept, practice, and reality of the PUBLIC realm as such, whether the moral obligation of government to provide for the general welfare or, as immediately before us now, the nation’s public lands, reserved as the heritage for all the people symbolizing freedom and common purpose, no longer capitalism trumping the principle of democracy, exploitation trumping the natural wealth of present and future generations, raw greed trumping the sense and sensibility of a living culture fulfilled through social cooperation and altruism. That the US has already fallen well below the standard of democracy, conservation, altruism helps explain the systemic pickle America is in, when among its most precious possessions, the LAND itself, is subject to the venomous thirst of a depredatory political culture consonant with the existence of massive wealth differentials and the ideological enshrinement of wealth as self-justifying, protected by while remaining above the law. In fact, what LAW, when society's unifying act is ownership conferring absolute rights of usage and, as wealth increases, shaping institutions and laws alike, with ruling groups forming the chief beneficiaries of this privatized structure which is heavily dependent on human separation and indifference to the needs of community. In short, America 2016, a continuity of societal process in its present form since at least the latter 19th century, exemplified by the plebeian fascism of armed insurrectionary ranchers in the Malheur National Wildlife Refuge as mere shock troops for the more basic corporate fascist takeover of America requiring symbols to justify and legitimate what, under the heading of antigovernment protest, is in reality the seizure of national wealth, the little guys cut in for the crumbs, by the militarized oligarchy of financial-industrial capitalism.

Item: today (1-12) we read in the NYT that yesterday, in Princeton, Oregon, armed occupiers of the refuge, appropriately calling themselves Citizens for Constitutional Freedom (using national symbols to advantage while transvaluing their meaning into the opposite—even the Orwellian world turned upside down), “have escalated their defiance of the federal government ... using bare hands and a Wildcat excavator stolen from the United States Fish and Wildlife Service to rip apart a barbed wire fence erected by the government at a far end of the vast refuge.” The rape of the environment is an ongoing fact of life in America, USF&WS hardly an adequate protector (same old story of US regulatory agencies in the hands of the interests which are to be regulated, dating back to at least the ICC and railroads of an earlier time), except that here issues are, in microcosm, so dramatically drawn even the agency is driven to protest. This, with Burns triggering the takeover of federal lands, while only a blip on the historical-ideological radar screen, is indicative of the fascistization now underway of the American polity, a wider context, even with respect to public lands, necessary for such insurrection to be possible. Yet daily in all ways the private encroachment of the public goes on, as in harnessing imperialism to such hegemonic purposes as global market and financial domination, the American military the ragtag propertied forces of Ammon Bundy writ large, literally, property on the march, privatization at home matching control of the internal economies of other nations abroad, a fetishism of capitalistic absolutism, with B-52s, regular and paramilitary forces, the CIA, and, briefcases in hand, the IMF and World Bank, the enlarged functional equivalent of the Wildcat excavator.

Complicating the process of government as the representation of the people's interests is that with rare exceptions, chiefly, in the New Deal, where public service was somehow extricated, as in CCC and WPA, from the swamp of Corporate Servitude, the history of regulation in America has been a betrayal of the people and the philosophy of democracy. So, even before this, with the public lands; but now, blatantly emblazoned, along with such ideological signs as in carrying weapons openly, as advertisement of things to come—dismantlement of the social safety net, for starters, an end to protective legislation in the workplace, abolition of progressive taxation, grab-as-grab can extraction of natural resources, further growth of the military budget, steps in the direction, all in all, toward full-blown totalitarianism, Ammon's ranchers prototypical shock troops, and the legions of recruits drawn from small business, disillusioned labor, and the white collar sector of insurance agents and other examples of Babbitts standing shoulder to shoulder with them nationwide, as so much window dressing for the large-scale skullduggery normalizing the pattern of wealth and power systemically rooted in a private-rights economy and society. Grazing rights are on a continuum with Individualism run amuck, an ideological springboard to unrestrained capitalist development in increasingly fewer hands.

But while our attention is on Burns and east-central Oregon, we see a parallel process at work far more damaging to the public realm, precisely because appropriating the mantle of legality, yes, privatization via legislative action rather than armed insurrection, the latter an energizing tool which also lends respectability to the former. (A Far-Rightist projection makes the Right itself look Centrist, the usefulness of shock troops to ongoing privatization.) I am referring to Jack Healy and Kirk Johnson's NYT article, "The Larger, but Quieter Than Bundy, Push to Take Over Federal Land," January 11, which describes, in this area, what is going on promiscuously everywhere in the nation's law-making, including this week, what appears to be the Supreme Court's serious crippling of public-sector unions: a contagion of feeling and doctrine aimed at bringing America to its knees with respect to human rights, equality, and the moral-political obligation of government and society to their full realization and preservation. Healy-Johnson begin: "Ken Ivory, a Republican state representative from Utah, has been roaming the West with an alluring pitch to cattle ranchers, farmers and conservatives upset with how Washington controls the wide-open public spaces out here: This land is your land, he says, and not the federal government's." Aside from negating the whole thrust of Pete Seeger's magnificent anthem in celebration of the commonweal, a polity of justice, now caricatured so as to be the basis for its destruction, we see in Ivory an advanced agent of plutocracy providing the nuts-and-bolts actions, one of many such persons, for that destruction: "Mr. Ivory, a business lawyer from suburban Salt Lake City, does not fit the profile of a sun-scorched sagebrush rebel. But he is part of a growing Republican-led movement pushing the federal government to hand over to the states millions of acres of Western public lands—as well as their rich stores of coal, timber and grazing grass."

Selfless modern-day Minute Men, not hardly unless you give the Koch Brothers fife and drum: "It's like having your hands on the lever of a modern-day Louisiana Purchase," said Mr. Ivory, who founded the American Lands Council [always the names, in Goebbels'-style propaganda, seem so innocent and harmless] and until recently was its president. The Utah-based group is funded mostly by donations from county governments [presumably still closer to appeals for privatization], but has received support from Americans for Prosperity [another beauty!], the group back by the billionaire Koch brothers.'" They continue: The idea of "radically reshap[ing] the West" fits well with Bundy's occupation effort, and "has grown amid a dust storm of rural anger" at Obama's supposed [my interpretation, not theirs] "efforts to tighten regulations on fracking, air quality, small streams and other environmental issues" accounting for the anger. Here Rightist Centrism merely drives the Far Right to further extremes, a pretext using Obama to pull out all stops. "In the past few years," the reporters note, "lawmakers across the West have offered up dozens of bills and resolutions seeking to take over the federal lands.... Some of the legislation has been aimed at Congress, to urge it to radically revise the laws that have shaped 550,000 square miles of national forests and terrain ... stretching from the Great Plains to the Pacific." The Bureau of Land Management, reading some of the statements in Congress, would seem to be a branch of the Soviet

Politburo—and even Ted Cruz had jumped in early (July 2014) with a proposal “preventing the federal government from owning more than half of any state’s land.”

As the reporters point out, details are meager on how to execute the provisions of privatization, the important point being first to knock out the federal government, the mission statement of the American Lands Council strategy “for securing local control of public land in the West” thus involving “four tenets: education, negotiation, legislation and litigation.” When fascism comes to America (if it has not already) it may involve, not armed insurrection, but the lawyerly stealth of vested interests via the utter transmogrification of constitution, law, ethics, the whole nine yards of inverting principles of democracy and social justice. Not to worry: Phil Lyman, a San Juan County, Utah commissioner “received a 10-day jail sentence after he led a protest ride on all-terrain vehicles through a federal area that had been closed to motorized use,” showing the government is on the people’s side, handing out stiff sentences for breaking the law. Bosh. The law is contemptuously broken with occasional slaps on the wrist, with larger numbers of Americans echoing Lyman’s own statement: “It seems to be getting worse, and the federal agencies, they are expanding. Their restraints are being overstepped. It’s not the way this country was set up. It’s not the founders’ design.” No siree, America’s greatness more and more has come to mean, property over all else, government be damned, nature just one more hostage to the appetitive spirit.

JANUARY 15, 2016

The Politics of Cultural Despair: America’s Self-Immolation

America offers itself in sacrifice, a sacrificial victim to its hunger for, not just capitalism, although its centuries of ideological brainwashing has rendered capitalism per se infused with societal purpose, but capitalist hegemony, the exercise of preponderant influence and power, the top rung of the ladder, in unilaterally shaping the global structure to its military-financial-commercial advantage. Ain’t gonna happen; can’t happen; maybe in the aftermath of World War II, when the rest of the world was exhausted, prostrated, but not now, in an infinitely more complex international system organized around discrete major power blocs capable of recognizing their respective self-interests and acting accordingly. China is not afraid of the US, nor is Russia, nor, increasingly, is the EU, and that just for starters. This is a rude awakening for America, and given its national beliefs, the moral certitude of its own exceptionalism, its faith in militaristic responses to perceived trouble, its feigned reliance on God to see it through the foibles of wealth concentration and foreign adventurism, such a fate of political-structural decline will not be taken lightly, that is, not without a fight before it sinks down into the abyss of everyday equality with other nations—a horrible nightmare to the arrogant, the spoiled, the conquering heroes of American political and economic leadership.

A straw in the wind: the reengineering of nuclear weaponry to emphasize tactical weapons and thus make nuclear war itself thinkable. Another straw in the wind: the long lines to buy tickets for the Powerball drawings, a futile act of desperation in search of wealth, the get-rich schemes gnawing into the national mindset. Actually, they have in common what I term Thanatosean America, in Freud, an instinctual desire for death, but without its counterweight, an affirmation of the forces of life. How can there be life, when America has constructed an enormous death machine draining all before it and leaving an empty husk in the civil space with unemployment, a crumbling infrastructure, xenophobic mouthings, extensive poverty (coupled with all-time wealth concentration, billionaires roaming the political landscape) to fill in the vacuum. Life? Obama's pet project is drone assassination. And that is window dressing for the underlying systemic dynamics which have reduced the individual to an obedient cipher, the logical end of transforming him/her into a commodity, capitalism's depersonalization of the human being.

We have just witnessed the State of the Union address, Obama's plea for civility in politics, yet he paints too dour a picture in one critical respect: civility abounds in American politics when it comes to the important things. Civility, as bipartisan consensus, over war, intervention, regime change (even Bernie on the Three Horsemen of the Apocalypse); civility, over the warrant for commercial-financial expansion, disguised as America's destiny (exceptionalism); civility, over one-sided trade partnerships; civility, over environmental degradation; civility, over humongous military budgets (here Bernie may be potentially breaking away); thus, civility where it counts, the widespread acceptance in politics, economics, and culture of a United States clinging to life-support, so that its puristic capitalism can remain unblemished, a conception of capitalism as fitting for the late 19th century (with its Darwinian rationales for wealth and race inequality, and for the building of gigantic holdings in industry and finance) as for the present day, accelerating these trends to a point where America stands alone and supreme as the custodian of unearned wealth and repository of fear, as though associated through an implicit assumption that the gig is up: no further forcible remaking of the world in its image.

Where civility does not hold lies in the race to see who can better serve wealth, strengthen the military, and manipulate—if such is needed—the individual to blind submission to these ends. Here the Democrats are giving the Republicans a race for their money, now the loyal opposition in proving their 100% Americanism, a Trump-Clinton contest requiring an electron microscope to spot the differences. The fascistic garbage being spouted on the Republican side, animating the spirit of the militia movements and gun-toting public, is ineffectually opposed by the other side, and on foreign policy Sanders has yet to distinguish himself from Clinton or Republicans. Politics is a unique barometer of the national mind and spirit; for America, the bravado of the rhetoric suggests a stridency of running scared to hide an awareness of declining fortunes, a political economy bereft of performance serving the general welfare, a military establishment gone cockamamie (under civilian-leadership instigation) in its quest for power and absolutist national security, a docile citizenry unmindful of the totalitarian implications of massive NSA surveillance ... but hold on, you may have a winning Powerball ticket, and so everything is okay. Dream on, as alienation crumbles a democratic social order.

JANUARY 19, 2016

In Memoriam, Dr. King: A Belated Tribute

I did not attend my university's ceremonies commemorating the life of Martin Luther King, Jr. How could I? Michigan State was up to its neck in violating the record and spirit of everything Dr. King did and stood for, and yet today, January 17, it seeks, as does Barack Obama and the preponderance of national black leaders, to hide behind his image, falsifying it to satisfy current policies of war, reaction, corporate-financial usurpation of democratic principles, blaspheming his memory for the proverbial gold coin derived from feathering the nest of of the economic elite and its military cohort. I believe I have earned the right to criticize, not because I, and countless others, including Sen. Sanders, attended the March on Washington, but because I saw at first hand, looking directly into his eyes from six inches away, the fear of assassination, yet determination to plow on, that Dr. King carried as a burden in the last few years of his life.

In contrast, fast-forward several years, Clifton Wharton, MSU's first black president, when I first joined the faculty, had recently completed a stint serving the Rockefeller Brothers' interests in upper South America (a not-so-early indication of the counterrevolutionary role played by CIA-assisted NGOs and private foundations in American foreign policy), carrying forward the earlier work of John Hannah, who grossly assisted in the dirtiest of dirty policies, including torture, in Vietnam, and, in the protests against the war, here and on college campuses throughout the country in Spring of 1970, ringed the student union building, where faculty and students were planning the next stage of the Strike (to go into the inner city schools of Detroit and help out in any way possible), with black paddy wagons drawn from the local police forces and at midnight conducted mass arrests, including that of a pregnant woman, on the ground of violating the building's closing hours, for an overnight stay in the Lansing jail. So much for freedom of expression, so much for committing the heinous crimes of taking our classes into the churches of the community so as not to miss assignments and volunteering for conducting tutorials in Detroit's schools. Wharton persisted with a full-dress hearing days later, not unlike the general atmosphere of the school, where "patriotic" faculty denounced their colleagues (something I had not forgotten in 29 years as full professor, but par for the course wherever universities were complicit in US war planning, acts of prostitution in servicing corporate research needs, etc., and staffed by professors cum careerists and ideologues, often the same). From there he went on to head TIAA-CREF and have a major entertainment center on campus named after him.

Yet it is those in administrative posts today, black and white, and the faculty flunkies courting favor, who dare celebrate Dr. King today, individuals who, if they were of Dr. King's generation, were contemptuous of his Poor People's Campaign, and even more, his strong antiwar position. That is the problem: those who never earned their stripes in either the civil-rights or antiwar struggles, and their present-day inheritors of the heart-wrenching sacrifices he made to get them to where they are, Obama, above all, have simply cashed in, with utter cynicism, and betrayed their fellow blacks (where do we find even the semblance of a vital social safety net, the redistribution of wealth and power, the pursuit of genuine peace, even control over police brutality?) and social-justice aims of government. And not to appear prejudiced, blacks are only mirroring the nation's mindset, still white defined, in which the standards raised by Dr. King are repudiating them in the act of honoring them, a systemic Janus-faced hypocrisy at the heart of the country's psyche.

Eyeball-to-eyeball contact: Return to Spring 1965, the Selma March went off as planned. How could it not, with the star power in the first two rows, the international media coverage, the protection provided—none of the grittiness and danger that soon followed, when people went home and media attention turned elsewhere? Intuitively I stayed away (unlike the March on Washington two years before, which felt somehow different, a mass demonstration seeming to break new ground—although it, too, had its precedents on a smaller scale), yet when we heard that Rev. James Reeb, a Boston Unitarian minister, had been murdered on the streets of Selma (Reeb once officiated at the marriage of one of my students), I, then at Yale, organized an interracial group from Yale Divinity School, borrowed a car, and rushed down to provide reinforcements—and there the moving significance of Selma began for me. Shortly after arrival we were crowded in Brown's Church, sitting in the rounded balcony, where Dr. King delivered a magnificent eulogy for Rev. Reeb. We were a true congregation, not an audience, and as we sang "We Shall Overcome," hands on each others' shoulders, swaying in alternate directions, the effect was indescribable. That night we held an all-night vigil from the church, facing a road in which Alabama state-trooper vehicles two abreast stretched practically as far as the eye could see, a symbolic confrontation, completely safe, typical of such observances, except for the display of force.

Later in the week, things changed. Dr. King and staff entered the Montgomery courthouse, a small group of followers gathered outside, to voice demands for better conditions and voting rights, as meanwhile a drenching rain had set in. We were miles away, in Selma. Word came of those outside being subject to severe beatings by the police; James Farmer, leader of CORE and a truly impressive figure, sent word out to me and others, get to Montgomery and reinforce the protest. Again, an interracial car, speeding there (as I describe in an earlier CP article, winding up in a cavalcade of state troopers also rushing to the scene, too busy for us—a steady 80 mph or more), and arriving, a scene of desolation: cracked skulls, bodies strewn everywhere in the little park, rain falling in sheets. After awhile, soaked to the skin, I made my way back to the car via a narrow alley, returning to the scene with only a gabardine coat on. It was there I saw Dr. King accompanied by Andrew Young, squeezing through the narrow space; they spotted me in the distance, and I realized, they may have thought I was an assassin coming toward them. We stopped, I did everything possible to reassure them by facial expression, mumbled words, posture, and as we passed so close as barely to get by, time had frozen in what seemed an eternity, as I conveyed my respect and, yes, love, and then we went our ways. The carnage was awful, part of the true story of Selma after the spotlights were turned off. Another part of the story, which we did not know at the moment, on our safe return to Selma that night, was that a car driven by Viola Liuzzo of Detroit, also with an interracial group, was shot at on that lonely highway, with Mrs. Liuzzo killed, murdered.

Our would-be King-legacy-inheritors, who have shown they don't give a snap for the poor, of both races, and, as part of their self-promotion have enlisted in the cause of imperialism, to the killing and maiming largely of persons of color, these leaders, white and black alike, righteous to their tippy toes, are as I write solemnly extolling Dr. King's virtues suitably sanitized to expunge from the record his answering the call of the Memphis sanitation workers and the underclass as a whole in America, his stance, though obviously unpopular at the time, of opposition to the war in Vietnam, as, if he were alive today, his opposition to all of America's wars, interventions, regime changes, its confrontation with China and Russia, its manipulation of international trade arrangements both to further US market penetration and serve as pretext for military alliance systems, joint maneuvers, the march to hegemonic unilateral dominance in the world, a sordid record of achievement for which his rejection cost him his life. By all means, celebrate the man wholly disjointed from the ruling groups and power structure responsible for the problems and grievances he sought to rectify, a sainthood detached from the reality of his struggles, having the effect of cheapening both. The paradox of dishonoring the honored sums up the current practice, one exemplified in the Democratic debate tonight in which Clinton and Sanders are trying to outdo each other in courting the black vote.

As preparation for that event, Clinton has issued a proposal for improving the condition and status of blacks (the linkage supplied in today's Guardian) entitled, "Growing Together: Hillary Clinton's Vision for a New Economic Future for African-American Communities," perhaps good as far as it goes, but problematic to a fault because far too generalized to be useful, even as a "vision," and more important, so structurally situated completely within existing capitalism as to limit the possibility of securing the modest goals to be attained. The document notes that "more than half a century after Dr. King voiced his dream for a more equal America and civil rights activists marched and died for the right to vote, race still plays a role in determining who gets ahead in America—and who gets left behind." Splendid, though nowhere is it mentioned that inequality goes beyond questions of voting rights and upward mobility, to the systemic attributes of advanced capitalism in America, which includes increasing wealth-concentration and industrial-financial consolidation, fueled not only by long-term trends of governmental corporate policies, but also a foreign-policy course of aggressively securing raw materials, markets, and investments—none of the foregoing alluded to, or remotely touched on, in her remediation of inequality in general, racial inequality in particular. In fact, she has supported, as senator and Secretary of State exactly those developments that make a mockery of her sudden interest in, and support of, improving the existing racial disparities in rights, wealth, and power.

Clinton presents her program in a vacuum: universalize educational opportunities, make college affordable, create good-paying jobs, preserve and strengthen Social Security, reform the criminal justice system, prevent gun violence, support small business—each and all (along with several more, like ending racial profiling and promoting better transportation to work) highly commendable, but even if achieved, neither improving the goal of racial democratization nor reducing the existence, privileges, and advantages of a demonstrable ruling group or class in command of consequential decision-making affecting war and peace abroad, civil liberties at home, and the myriad details in between, from environmental protection to labor organization. But why should we expect differently? Clinton is a good Democrat, nothing more or less, and thus pledged to a distorted, exaggerated view of national security, an allegiance to monopoly capital and specialized sectors like energy, pharmaceuticals, above all, defense. At best, blacks will be more comfortable in a Clintonian world, yet one that savages the rest of the world and those, domestically, who do not play the game, their comfort bringing them down to the same level of complicity with and enjoyment of the benefits derived from militarism and imperialism.

Dr. King saw through this ideological sham. Black self-improvement through the canons (and cannons) of a merciless violence-prone capitalism was, he believed, not worth the candle, a denigration of the potential racial ennoblement as preparation for a unified humankind. He did not have to be anti-capitalist per se; simply to be an advocate for non-violence was itself the sufficient answer to modern capitalism, which depends for its sustainment and performance on war and the preparation for war. By virtually all agreement, Clinton is a hawk, which invalidates her position on the whole gamut of her provisions for racial betterment: an opportunist who is tweaking the system for fairer mortgage rates which it should provide anyway, as meanwhile the ongoing processes of wealth creation continue unabated. And Sanders is not much better, whether on race or foreign policy. At least she took the trouble to issue a position paper, poor as it is, as he, glad-handing his way through the states, feigns democratic socialism, smiles, and leaves the structure of American imperialism intact, and the industries, banks, and firms standing behind it. If Dr. King would have had little use for Clinton, what use would Eugene Debs have had for Sanders?

We live in a world of imposters, the gradual melding into one of a position defined as American, with little to distinguish candidates of both parties, save on degrees of protestation as to their patriotism (Sanders keeps invoking veterans, not to say his historically compromised position on gun control, which he is now expected to modify) and obeisance to the property right. So be it, we get what we deserve. And America does not deserve to celebrate Dr. King's birthday; it has, instead, defamed him in ways large and small, ratcheting up violence while eroding basic guarantees of the human person, in both cases to the sacrifice of elemental principles of social justice and individual as well as structural potentiality. We turn, then, briefly to the Democratic debate. [I have now watched the debate on television, and I see no reason to modify what I wrote above—if anything, the situation appears to be worse; except for O'Malley, on whom I won't comment, both Clinton and Sanders inhabit a constricted political universe promising continuity in applying the permanent-war doctrine and, on domestic issues, pridefully affirming, rather than transcending, the Obama framework and record of corporatist liberalism.]

As predicted, the flimflam artistry remains in vogue. Clinton is Clinton. Like Cruz, petulant, with suppressed anger and a colossal sense of personal entitlement, she was hiding behind, or else draped herself around, Obama at every turn, at one point even boasting about hours spent in the Situation Room—as on an earlier occasion, just one of the (militarist) boys, a tried and true commander-in-chief in the making. But it was her strident, yet cunningly oblique, defense of Wall Street which most stood out, somehow converting Goldman Sachs into an eleemosynary institution whose high speakers' fees, of which she was a handsome recipient, advanced the work of charity and reform. Clinton, the artful dodger, had a 3-point, 4-point, 5-point, etc., plan for everything, yet the plans themselves, especially the revision of health care, smell to me moldy and accommodative to America's vested interests. Therefore, from a Left perspective, she was indeed vulnerable to attack from an authentic democratic socialist.

None, however, was in attendance, Sanders, to his everlasting shame, also seeking to wear the Obama mantle, particularly on foreign policy, sharing in the demonization of Russia and Putin (Clinton here almost outstripping the Republicans in her macho-brand of power politics, while Sanders dutifully went along with the tide), and in domestic policy, while off to a good start, failed to link Obama and the Democratic party itself sufficiently with Wall Street. Perhaps that is the point: one cannot remain a Democrat and expect to advocate for, much less realize, the democratization of the system of power, its industrial-financial-commercial components, and most fundamental, its militaristic character and purpose. I am all for Sanders's swipe at Wall Street, but it is no more than that, a swipe, a sweeping blow with inadequate follow-up. He is, if not all smoke and mirrors, and certainly not the abominable fakir that Clinton is, nonetheless Sanders is completely out of his element, one foot in the progressive camp, the other on liberal terra firma (I, too, favor the restoration of Glass-Steagall, but even that, without more cogent criticism of the banking structure, is hardly an attack on finance capitalism), liberal terra firma signifying cosmetic changes to the distribution of wealth and power in America.

JANUARY 20, 2016

Reptilian Politics and American Leadership: The Party Debates

The Republicans had at each other, narrowing their candidate field essentially to two, as the remaining incipient fascists desperately tried to attract attention, Rubio notably, with Bush in strangely paralytic or laconic mode, and failed in the effort. This political closure is what happens when the ideological spectrum is so confined that little possibility emerges for distinguishing oneself from the rest, and only the strong of will, Trump and Cruz, survive. Yet I sense real differences between them, Cruz by far the more dangerous, less on policy than on personality, the latter of which could so surcharge policy as to reach Hitlerian proportions in execution. Cruz is a bundle of suppressed anger and resentment, while Trump, as though emerging from Mel Brooks's central casting, is a less resentful, more "here I am, this is what you see," version of a comedic Hermann Goring, hardly outside the confines of totalitarianism, but still human enough to let contrary experiences and thoughts filter in. America in the case of either one would still pursue repression at home and hegemonic militarized goals abroad—a probability with the chief Democratic candidates as well, Clinton's fascistic-inclined demons a perfect match to Cruz's, softened for public consumption by public-relations assistance, and Sanders truly problematic as faux socialism covers over a dreadful foreign policy, support of the gun culture, and, even on health care, backpedalling into the dim light of gradualism. He isn't Trump, but neither is he a clear alternative to him.

I say "reptilian," because of, appearance wise, in Cruz, pythonic eyes, behind which, from what he actually stands for in policy, is a constricting reflex-motion to squeeze out of the body politic any traces of humanitarian regard for others, especially when formulated as a moral obligation of government to serve the people, and in foreign policy, a quintessential ruthlessness based on a take-no-hostages attitude. Nothing squeamish here, across-the-boards. Trump, perhaps to his credit, and to his shame among rank-and-file Republicans, lacks the evangelical-killer instinct in converting every issue into an ideological watershed. He gives no evidence of having despised life, including his own. For Clinton, "reptilian" remains apt (and like Trump, less so for Sanders) in light of her creeping, slithering approach to issues, particularly involving militarism and haute capitalism (Wall Street) and her instinctive love of camouflage (a strong desire for concealment and dislike of transparency, especially in government). She too, like Cruz, goes for the jugular when it comes to perceived enemies, and is equally a vast storehouse of resentments ready to explode when given the opportunity. Sanders, by comparison, is no angel, but his opportunism appears shorn of vindictiveness, thereby allowing him, psychologically, to reach out to people in a more genuine way—the old Democratic schtick of welfare/warfare, that of constructive social welfare programs at home, retention of Cold War policies overseas.

Jonathan Martin and Patrick Healy's NYT article, "At Republican Debate, Taunts and Quips as Rivals Battle," January 15, barely scratches the surface, but does refer in passing to Cruz's attack on Trump for embodying "New York values," Cruz stating, in part, "I think most people know exactly what New York values are: socially liberal, pro-gay marriage, pro-abortion, focused on money and the media." The verbal pus oozes out. One in tune with underlying psychological dynamics, however, wants more, recognizing the hatred behind the politically opportunist examples he cites. And fortunately, the next day, still in Charleston, scene of the debate, we find him speaking to a Conservative Leadership Project (NYT, First Draft, January 16) in which he mock-apologizes for his dig at Trump in the debate (my initial take was “New York values” was code for anti-Semitism) by enumerating a whole list of grievances: “Now I’m curious. Do the people of South Carolina know what New York values are?” Cruz continues, after first going on Sean Hannity’s show and issuing a news release, in what is an unstoppable gush of bitterness and resentment, incapable of holding back:

“So today, Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton and Gov. Andrew Cuomo and Mayor Bill de Blasio of New York City all demand I apologize. Who am I to say no? I apologize to the millions of New Yorkers who’ve been abandoned for years by liberal politicians. I apologize to all the hardworking men and women in New York who’d like to have jobs, but Gov. Cuomo has banned fracking. I apologize to all the New Yorkers who are pro-life and pro-marriage and pro-Second Amendment. I apologize to all the small businesses that are fleeing New York City because of the crushing taxes and regulations.”

The reporters: Cruz “also referenced Mr. de Blasio’s past clashes with his own Police Department and proponents of charter schools.” And Cruz ended up, he hoped “that was the apology they were looking for.” Sarcasm, of course, is a thin veneer for something deeper, and Cruz does not disappoint. Above, besides the debater’s trick of linking Trump up to Clinton and de Blasio, his contempt for the word “liberal” is itself a means to affirm environmental rape in close association with unrestricted guns [it turns out, Rubio, Cruz’s ideological near-twin, spent Christmas Eve in Miami conspicuously visiting a gun shop to purchase a pistol!] and an attack on taxes and regulation—together as tight a package of guttural neo-fascism as one is likely to find in national political life. For a Princeton-Harvard Law graduate, this is a bit disappointing, and the Martin-Healy article did not even mention Cruz’s attack, during the debate, on Lawrence Tribe, an essentially moderate, yes “liberal (in contradistinction to radical), constitutional law professor at Harvard. Cruz bottom-feeds on the primitively capitalistic and on eschatological and/or evangelical custodians of the religious system, to Trump’s slightly less zealously-minded, though plebeian-oriented neo-fascist, supporters—between them, a confining range, where temperament may trump (wrong pun) ideological rigidity.

My New York Times Comment on the Martin-Healy article, same date, follows:

When one considers that one of the two major parties put itself on display, the result is indeed depressing, that of a nation on the moral-ideological skids. The in-fighting was revealing of a hard core of Extreme Reaction, a rightward surge not seen since the days of McCarthyism following World War II.

And the people don’t fight back: e.g., Cruz’s attack on Lawrence Tribe will not prompt the Harvard Law faculty, regardless of political persuasion, to protest strongly the red-baiting of one of its graduates. A small detail—NYT, too, subjected to distortion and ridicule [on Cruz’s illegal and devious reporting of a large loan from Goldman Sachs for his 2012 Senate campaign], and in this piece, passing over it lightly.

In truth the Far Right mentalset witnessed last night has become intimidating, or rather, the general response reveals how far the nation has tilted. Dare I say it? We are closer to fascism than perhaps ever before—last night, hooliganism and smearing in full flavor. Each one, with Kasich an exception, trying to outdo the others in proving Rightist credentials, so that, in Trump’s favor, at least, despite his reactionary views, he didn’t appear with the kind of rehearsed spitefulness and viciousness of his colleagues. Instead, he was matter-of-fact, which leads one to think, he doesn't possess the vengefulness that makes Cruz and Rubio so dangerous, a more strident version of the young Nixon riding the wave of anticommunist hysteria. I fear for America from what I saw and heard.

As of this writing, the Democrats still have their upcoming debate, with Sanders by all reports spurting ahead of Clinton in Iowa and a presumed slugfest in the making. Yet, nothing has really changed, with respect to the fundamental question of the direction of US foreign policy, of determinative importance for the structuring and democratization of American society. Clinton has proven herself a trusted warhorse on national security, with intervention and regime change in her DNA, along with maintaining Obama's Cold War policies of confrontation with China and Russia. As Secretary of State she did not question or even seek to moderate the Pacific-first strategy and related Trans-Pacific Partnership, nor lessen the EU-NATO potential engagement of forces via deployment to the Russian border, all other constants of foreign policy also left largely unchanged with respect to Iran, North Korea, and of course the Middle East, with one-sided preferential treatment of Israel. Sanders here has nothing to offer except more of the same, thus vitiating whatever possibilities of differences he has with her on domestic policy.

Domestic policy is important, but what does it say of a nation that provides better health care at home while destroying the lives of innocent peoples abroad? What does it say, of more stringent corporate regulation at home while actively pursuing market and financial penetration abroad—another false dichotomization of reality in which the forces of wealth-concentration are assisted and continue? Sanders seems a Left-Donald Trump in that he refuses to cut away from American imperialism, and on gun control, Hillary is right (although she is no better) in calling attention to his record. So, we await the Democratic debate, but I suggest that we remain faced with a constipated dialogue between the two major parties; not only are Cruz and Clinton snakelike in their conduct, boa constrictors squashing the life and vitality out of democracy, thereby removing the air from public policy capable of addressing vast inequalities of wealth and power, the continued exacerbation of climate change, and escalating hegemonic claims to global supervision of the political-economic order. Of Trump and Sanders, we can expect if not a carbon copy of their opponents, then replication of the systemic universe which has established ideological boundaries to human creativity in nation-building, leaving us the same problems of international conflict and a social order dependent on expansion to avert stagnation. Trump would militarize capitalism; Sanders would soften the impact. In all four cases, Cruz, Clinton, Trump, Sanders, varying degrees of the law of the jungle would apply, each in readiness to strike at prey deemed harmful to America, Bernie's democratic socialism, to his credit, perhaps narrowing the target-list, but not changing the overall picture of America's combative mental set.

JANUARY 21, 2016

Nomenclatural Democracy?: Race (False)-Consciousness

You want controversy? I'll give you CONTROVERSY: The individual or group stands tall, is fully confident (liberated from feel-good shortcuts for remedying internalized perceptions of injured self-esteem, themselves based on historical-cultural realities of repression, discrimination, even prior servitude), and hence proudly affirms a condition of freedom, identity, and human worth, if and only if said individual or group removes all public-relations, symbolic, and etymological crutches standing in the way to an emancipated mindset free to combat, with others, systemic conditions responsible for all invidious distinctions in the first place. From a radical standpoint, race is a false social category, precisely because it undermines the actual practice of class, as in the formation of consciousness and the creation and energizing of protest. Race is divisive, as in its practical usage by ruling groups to divide the ranks of working people and set one group against another (the obvious strategy in the South for maintaining segregation for the century following the Civil War—the political formula of southern Populism in response being: You are kept apart, that you may be separately fleeced of your earnings. This application of race is only a special case of the tried-and-true method used when- and wherever upper groups feel under pressure from below, the classic promotion of the ethnocentric dodge to prevent the rise of radicalism through the unity of all similarly victimized and dispossessed by the common social system and political economy.

American capitalism owes its longevity and seeming vitality to the we-they dichotomization of people and social forces, racism the fundamental example, with radicalism, in contradistinction to patriotism, a related and closely-following second: in sum, the ideological molding of a stable polity, compliant workforce, and acquiescent populace in general. Where am I leading? To the assertion that the term “Negro” is, far from being a pejorative designation, a relic/reminder of slavery times, instead represents the marching cadence, soul-inspiring declaration, of a whole people in their struggle for human dignity and equality—i.e., collective selfhood as preparation for achieving the universality of humanity. That precisely is what Martin Luther King, Jr., stood for, and precisely what Paul Robeson stood for—listen to the words of one and the songs of the other: Negro, Negro, Negro, not black, Black, Afro-American, African-American, all convenient signifiers by a post Robeson-King generation of posturing “radicals” who have not, like these men, earned their stripes in the social struggle, and worse, have callously sought to erase the historical record of that struggle by a nimble change of terms.

When Dr. King mounted his Poor People’s Campaign toward the end of his life, he was certainly on track in the emphasis of class over race, a natural evolution of his position implicitly critical of capitalism early on, in which his commitment to nonviolence culminated in his opposition to the Vietnam War. But go back to the March on Washington itself, class over race at its most eloquent expression. I was present; I still respond with tears as I quote his words. Listen, a quarter of a million people, placards relating Jobs to Freedom, solemn, heating beating down: “Now is the time to lift our nation from the quicksands of racial injustice to the solid rock of brotherhood. Now is the time to make justice a reality for all of God’s children....The marvelous new militancy which has engulfed the Negro community must not lead us to a distrust of all white people, for many of our white brothers as evidenced by their presence here today have come to realize that their destiny is tied up with our destiny.” Yes, the germinating ground for class solidarity, so woefully lacking and perhaps designedly discouraged in present-day America. And Dr. King continued: “No, we are not satisfied and we will not be satisfied until justice rolls down like water and righteousness like a mighty stream.” These will not be separate streams but a unitary flow, propelling forward his dream, one sacred to all who value human rights: “I have a dream that one day this nation will rise up and live out the true meaning of its creed: ‘We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal.’...I have a dream that my four little children will one day live in a nation where they will not be judged by the color of their skin, but by the content of their character.” Verily, a democratic character ascribable to all, of every race, color, creed, democracy incarnate, not the proto-fascistic piffle defining the current political culture and climate.

I cannot hope to convince anyone that our day-sailors of racial emancipation, Negro and white alike, have wrought great damage to the cause of freedom through focusing on race as in fact a diversion from the analysis, criticism, and ultimate displacement of capitalism qua capitalism, a social order which perpetuates racial identity for its own exploitative purposes. The compelling case in point is the Obama Phenomenon, a perfect example of the self-pacification of the Negro community, where silence of a potentially radical constituency has been gained through appeal to racial identity, so that matters of extreme importance, from wealth-concentration and gross inequalities resulting therefrom, to an active agenda of war, intervention, and regime change, are taken off the table, obscured, removed from sight—race therefore a plaything, object of manipulation, for the strengthening the status quo. And what can be done on race can also be done on class, labor rights destroyed and redefined (aka, social patriotism) as a similar process of, to use a Nazi phrase popularized by Goebbels's propaganda machine, "divert the gaze of the masses," in classic obfuscatory ways, ironically, currently the technique of liberalism to advance a corporatist agenda, rather than the straight-out racism and defamation of class propounded by conservatives and reactionaries. Neither liberals nor conservatives want structural clarity, leading to class realignment, democratization, an end to hegemonic goals in foreign policy.

In Sunday's debate, Clinton's cloying attachment to Obama had the twofold purpose of keeping the black community (I do not object to "black," not capitalized, as being interchangeable with "Negro," provided of course, capitalized, consistent usage would refer to European-American, Caucasian-American, or simply White-American, all equivalents of African-American) her loyal support and identifying with his total policy framework as her own. Obama becomes code for favoritism to Wall Street, confrontation with China and Russia, domestic national-security policy of massive surveillance, etc., ad nauseam, with blacks going down-the-line abjectly in support of these developments and now transferring allegiance to Clinton. Talk of false consciousness! I submit that because race-identity has been magnified, not least at the hands of self-promoting black leaders and echoed by white liberals, both using "African-American" as an incantation to demonstrate their putative radicalism (while remaining excessively short on substance), one finds radicalism set back if not permanently then until somehow blacks and whites transcend their respective racial identities for an authentic class alignment which addresses the problems of capitalism.

It is no coincidence that King and Robeson, joined, e.g., by A. Philip Randolph, used the term "Negro," not because they were behind the times—needing a Stokely Carmichael to expose the so-called accommodationist-generation as a means of catching up and embracing a progressive future of Black Power, Black-is-beautiful, and today, Black Lives Matter—but because Dr. King and the others acted with every fiber of their being in dedication to the proposition that ALL human beings were equal, whether under God or deduced from universal moral principles. Not Black Power, but Class Power (and working class at that); not Black-is-beautiful, but all human beings, of whatever color, are beautiful; not Black Lives Matter, but, as Robeson sang out, "white or black or tan, he's my kind of a guy." And if suddenly, gender sensitivities are injected in criticism of the latter, I can only say, gender consciousness, like racial consciousness, is a form of fools-gold, to distract from the beauties of class consciousness, where both genders (and gradations thereof) will live in harmony and be equal. Equality must not be made subject to subdivision; so long as even a shadow of a doubt exists on that score, ruling groups will have won and be laughing all the way to the bank.

JANUARY 22, 2016

Trump-Palin: Dynamic Duo of Fascistic America

A Trump-Palin ticket (it's too early to tell whether this is a serious prospect, but it represents an idealized political configuration with significant roots in both major parties) would sweep all before it in this blessedly f***ed up nation because it unites two principal strands in America's historical political culture and ideology: the veneration of wealth (Trump) and plebeian fascism (Palin), a seemingly unbeatable combination matching the decades-long experience of how US capitalist development evolved into a unilateral global hegemon. For this to occur, it takes, in the words of sainted Ronald Reagan, two to tango, a whirling-dervish kind of dance, nearly out of control in its fast-spinning militarization of policies and values. Upper groups administer (and of course profit from) the social structure, itself built upon the product of their own labor, from war-making to market penetration to, the end-goal, capital accumulation, while working people beginning with the antilabor climate following World War II supplied the shock troops, via their consent to and complicity in furthering a capitalistic-inspired societal process of fascistization, for whom junior partnership (which included support of the Cold War) seemed more attractive than outright suppression. Taft-Hartley, the spiritual and practical undoing of the Wagner Act, pointed to the future, a kept working class, its militancy slowly leached out in the days of red-baiting McCarthyism, anticommunism reified, fructified, so that it had the stuffing knocked out of it. I recall vividly picketing on Boston Common in the late 1950s, against nuclear testing, and, by unwritten code, on behalf of civil rights, when construction workers piled out of the subway, came by, tore up our signs, roughed us up, no police in sight (or on site), the scene driving home to me that American workers would have built crematoria if it meant better-paying jobs.

Such was America then, and I believe now: entrenched wealth/plebeian fascism. If Trump and Palin never existed, we would have had to invent them (the Sartre analysis, in “Portrait of the Anti-Semite,” holds equally here, the psychological dynamics of Rightist invention) though as it currently turns out, Cruz and Clinton will do as somewhat imperfect analogues, she, of wealth, he, of plebeian appeal (a more guttural fascism), despite having a hand in the till. It seems that candidates and parties no longer matter, how deeply entrenched authoritarianism has taken hold in the national polity and psyche alike, my image of Thanatosean America propelled by a death-wish of increasing nihilism, as the ground, literally, is being despoiled under us, climate change proceeding on a runaway track, social forces of actual and potential radicalism, if not at each other’s throat, then seemingly incapable of unified CLASS—rather than race, ethnic, and gender—action, all encased in a tightly-woven pattern of political-economic organicism, each constituent knowing its place in the Grand Hierarchy, capitalists, lead and profit, workers aspire and hold constant or sink, a diversely composed underclass suited for military duty or lumpen-proletariat functions of, as now, electing and re-electing the corrupted servants of power: so why not a Trump-Palin ticket, poised for success?

Perhaps America could do no worse, the Democratic party long ago self-castrated by fears of Rightist denunciation (from Truman and Kennedy to the present, willing supplicants at the altar of the Cold War) while producing its own share of billionaires equally to the task of mounting an aggressive foreign policy and, for public consumption, giving monolithic capitalism a liberal patina. Upper wealth possesses a common face, as we marionettes, in spasmodic life-step, jerkily respond below, wired to do its bidding. Conspiracy theory? Hardly; instead, a factual diagram of the structure of wealth and power in America, concentration and consolidation of the socioeconomic framework with its corresponding ideological rationale, undeniable reality when one examines decision-making and its results, wherein party differences have little effect, and indeed are ruled out, where both the conservation, nay, sacral nature, of property and the unimpeded drive for imperialism are involved. America, of course, could do better than Trump and Palin for executing the paradigm of fascism (Obama illustrates the co-optative “liberalism” as a means to that end, although himself a dead giveaway, in my reading of his record, of the fascist inclination, i.e., corporatism plus war), but why bother? One dynamic duo is as good as another, with plenty to draw upon in both parties’ pool.

Politics is no longer the art of the possible, if it ever was (save perhaps during the New Deal), but the craft of the cunning and corrupt, whose career ambitions mesh perfectly with the needs of capitalism, which translates wealth into power and fixes both at the core of the polity. Palin is useful to Trump (her speeches are more off-the-cuff muscular than his) in ramming home the value and legitimacy of force in international relations, and not coddling presumed malcontents in America: paradoxically, an all-powerful State, which eschews the role of government in just about everything that pertains to societal welfare, (of course) taxation, the democratization of class and income—everything, that is, except the capability and actuality of war, in which case government is laudable and, along with business, a suitable object of patriotic devotion. When Palin stated that Trump has “been able to tear the veil off this idea of the system,” this “idea” was not establishment-Republicanism (“He’s been going rogue left and right”) but rather the system per se, its protective democratic rights (whether or not honored), its constitutional foundations. The State will do the bidding of its most powerful forces, and offer explanations—if at all—afterward.

America is in process of speedily being reconstructed (“tear[ing] the veil off”) to yield wealth its just deserts, a world system where friendly dictators need fear nothing by way of intervention or criticism, only arms shipments for their loyalty and favorable investment climate, and where US-defined globalization on all essential matters (subject to our definition) is incontestable, if necessary in making it so through facing off against Russia and China. Just as one of his and her themes is, America does not apologize to anyone (the recent reference to Iran, and noted in her endorsement speech of Trump), our dynamic duo carries belligerence/resentment to lengths, if still exceeded by Cruz and Clinton, which pose a danger obviously to world peace but also, less obvious perhaps, to domestic freedoms of expression and association. The Trump-Palin appeal to libertarians, the other side of the coin to evangelicals, is hollow, pure malarkey, as repression (e.g., closing the borders) would take on a self-justifying life of its own. Grimly, there is little assurance things would be better or different in Democratic hands.

JANUARY 25, 2016

Regulatory Farce: Internal Capitalist Hegemony

Privatization is historically inscribed in America’s structural-ideological DNA, solidly entrenched, near-impossible to dislodge, ever since (if not before) John Locke’s formulation, only confirming the trend lines from enclosures, to mercantilism, to nascent capitalism, of the antecedent rights of property over government and society. In the righteous world of capitalism property trumps all before it, and for America, doubly true given its essential start as a New World tableau in which feudal institutions were comparatively absent, leaving capitalism to grow free from the premodern obstacles making for more complex polities and political-social philosophies. As Louis Hartz proclaimed, in The Liberal Tradition in America, America was born capitalistic, it did not have to make itself so. Hartz may have had mixed feelings about that, advantages outweighing disadvantages, but my use of “farce”—ridiculous or empty show (one of Webster’s meanings)—suggests for me a systemic-cultural VOID when it comes to the social dimensions of human rights, the vitality of the multifaceted human personality not become transmogrified by commodity fetishism (Marx) into an accumulating/possessive animal valuing separation and competitive antagonism over mutuality and social cooperation.

We are what we are, having been made so by centuries in the promotion of (in-)human rights and societal privileges, freedom given the restricted meaning associated with life conditions of being free to prosper, free to sweat at low wages, free, ultimately, to starve, freedom replaced by the coded word LIBERTY (the darling of every rightwing appellation) signifying the amended meaning of freedom plus the ruthless individualistic ethos of subjugating all before one, from Indigenous People, to black slaves (chattel slavery narrowly shaped as a capitalistic institution complementing and integral to the national political economy), to tenants and sharecroppers on the land, to industrial workers, to ... fill-in the blank, whether unemployed, criminalized, ghettoized, you name it, a capitalism that feeds on, indeed nurtures, authoritarian submission.

What is absent from American Capitalism is any safeguarding of the public interest, any concept of a public sphere of government competence and jurisdiction, or go further, any notion of the public qua public, all-of-us as having basic rights under the fundamental law. Dickens’s Tale of Two Cities is child’s-play as compared with the division of wealth and power in America. How then expect a regulatory system to curb the influence and social-control possibilities of capital in America? The setting is inimical to any but hardline profiteering, unrestrained by the State, whose own function is interpreted as assisting, by military means internationally and at home if and when necessary, the political-economic process of wealth-making in private hands, not, therefore, wealth-creation to serve public ends, i.e., the needs of the people. Everything points to inequality as the ratifying condition of American liberty, freedom a suspicious word of no-doubt communist origin.

Sounds rhetorical, an empty indictment, one undeserved and historically false? The regulatory function of government is at the nerve-center of the realization of human rights. A privatized system of regulation may seem oxymoronic (in fact, it is!), yet that is the reality, government turned inside-out, to serve the groups tearing apart the societal fabric, profiting from their own control of the levers of authority and command of force, an hierarchical framework cemented together by the enforced dependence of the working class and poor on the ever-evolving and tightening pattern, now assuming US-defined globalized proportions, of corporate-monopoly organization sector-by-sector, financial, industrial, commercial, as though private government shielded by the thin layer of legitimacy of government proper, obfuscation on a grand scale insofar as the commonweal is concerned. Government of course is still needed: to fight wars, expand capitalism, ensure domestic social stability via engendering a permanent atmosphere of redbaiting and keeping tabs on dissent; but in its public function it stops at the water's edge of the business system.

The history is clear: the major railroads were instrumental in forming the Interstate Commerce Commission, to ensure against internecine competition; then the transition point to a privatized public regulation in TR's Bureau of Corporations, a House of Morgan creation (Roosevelt's role as trustbuster another meaning of farce, broadly satirical comedy and improbable plot); ditto, and more important, creation of the Federal Reserve System under Woodrow Wilson, banker-dominated, shaped, engineered from first to last by the leading banks, their operations now synchronized with government Treasury and broader financial policy; not to skip a beat, Herbert Hoover's leadership of the trade-association movement, which privatized for good and all the monopolistic system and impetus to foreign markets, technically, still private, but utterly reliant on government assistance and support; from there to more explicitly modern business structure, with FDR's National Recovery Administration and its code authorities sanctioning monopoly-concentration across the board (what makes the New Deal different, however, is that he also used government for public ends, a difficult balancing act in which Hugh Johnson faces, e.g., Henry Wallace, Harold Ickes, Harry Hopkins, and we find the magnificent experiment in human conservation of the Works Progress Administration and other programs and projects); and coming rapidly up to the present, a miasma of sell-out, betrayal, conniving with the culprits supposedly to be prosecuted for violating the public interest, in microcosm just the last few weeks alone, Interior/FBI/Bureau of Land Management, in Oregon, where armed insurrection is left untouched, a longstanding fear of enforcing the public interest on the public lands; the various agencies charged with maintaining the public health, EPA in particular, in Michigan, where switching the Flint water supply to a noxious river system in order to save a few bucks (under a governor-appointed manager superseding local authority), an austerity-driven move of fiscal-responsibility leaving children permanently deformed and learning-disabled because of the lead content of the water (the state's own regulatory body, Department of Environmental Quality, along with its governor, turning the other cheek until it is too late); finally the highway banditry of the pharmaceutical industry, cozied up by the Food and Drug Administration, again among other agencies, which has left drugs to treat life-threatening disease and illness at prices so high as to be out of public reach, a heartless victimization of the sick, criminal in inspiration and mindset yet allowed to continue under government purported regulation.

Other capitalist countries have achieved a closer approximation to the public welfare, perhaps because of a more variegated historical past and consequent richer political culture in the present, so that authentic regulation in the people's interest is not impossible under capitalism. Somewhat difficult and liable to change, but not impossible. Not so, America, its essentially antidemocratic history, stylized as democracy, having a built-in repudiation of the public realm. The regulators themselves have on the whole excelled in self-promotion, their duties and actual performance an open sesame through the revolving-door principle to lucrative jobs in industry, banking, business, what appears at the outset as mastering the art of trained INCAPACITY even to serve the public interest. EPA, FDA, BLM, an alphabet soup of privatized tyranny, integrated into a bureaucratic web thickened to disguise the ongoing dirty work of wealth-accumulation by which America defines its greatness.

JANUARY 27, 2016

Flint: Genocide by Design

America is in the business of killing off its presumed undesirables, conversely, playing favorites with those it admires. In simplistic terms, this comes down to race; yet race is code for other factors that transcend racial boundaries, so that whites as well as blacks are in the crosshairs of capitalism when these factors come into play: poverty, radicalism, vanishing industry, all three conspicuous in Flint's historical-cultural-industrial setting. Flint is a loser by American standards because it is predominantly black, is associated with labor militancy (heritage of the Sit-Down strikes), and, as determined by corporate giantism, no longer the green pastures sought by the automotive industry in its search for high profits. Still more basic, Flint is an ideal scapegoat in the structural context of internal colonialism, a throwaway appendage serving foremost as an example of America's powers, at home and abroad, to inflict pain and induce submission as a testimony to its own lofty purpose and rectitude as a Conquering Nation. Exceptionalism comes to Michigan with a vengeance, enjoying the full cooperation of federal, state, and local government in the city's plight of social misery.

Results can be achieved without conscious planning. Societal phenomena do not just happen, but when a nation's governing institution, political economy, and ideology converge, which is usually the case, a framework has been established for how people's lives are managed, what they are expected to think, and the mechanisms for social control instated to ensure stability. In Flint's case, the relative abandonment of its manufacturing base already served to discipline its population into fatalistic quiescence. Michael Moore lived to fight back, but not many more did. From all sides, the smell of the kill grew more acute, more enticing, Flint, a micro-Detroit too large to knock down and bring to its knees. Detroit is becoming gentrified piece by piece, Flint, however, too far gone for that purpose, and hence readied for the assault, the rape of its once-proud identity as a working-class true biracial town truly a red flag to the American bull[y] and logical target for the hate-driven ethnocentrism red-baiting/race-baiting characterizing the American mindset. Flint is like Minsk, too remote to worry about, yet under the surface fit for demonizing because somehow, dimly, representing the enemy, an alien existence.

When the switch was made in the water supply the EPA as a matter of course, given the source would be the Detroit River, should have demanded and enforced a rigid protocol backed by daily testing; the city health department and state Department of Environmental Quality, ditto in support of that effort; and the governor from day one on top of the situation. In my mind's eye I thought of an ideal experiment, simultaneous steps to introduce a toxic supply into the water systems of Flint and Traverse City, the latter white, privileged, good vibes emanating from its recreational image. If the lead content in the young children of Flint had been found in the children of Traverse City, would months of inaction, deceptions, outright lies, culminating in the governor's faux-apology to the state legislature have in the latter case happened or even been allowed? No, racism does not fully explain what happened in, and to, Flint, contemptuous dismissal of the class enemy, who signified an obstacle to enhanced capitalist development via relocated plants, outsourcing, the weakening of labor, all consistent with a primordial racism which no longer requires identification and expression, and, relatedly, the go-ahead signal to capitalism to make self-aggrandizing decisions with impunity, no explanations offered.

Meanwhile, the people of Flint, to all intents defeated, have not fought back, instead falling into despair or numbness. This is a battle of Cynical Triumph, enough criminal behavior spread out around the table so that no-one feels—or is to be judged—implicated. That children will bear the physical results and learning disabilities of contaminated water and contaminated measures of contaminated policy makers up and down the line is understood and explained by the classic evasion of monstrous evil: deus ex machina, as though introduced by God from heaven or, in Webster's, as introduced suddenly and unexpectedly and provides a contrived solution to an apparently insoluble difficulty. No-one takes real responsibility, a self-castrating exercise of both political parties, state and nation. Here it is instructive to look at Paul Krugman's NYT article, (Jan. 25), typical liberal tripe, as opposed to radical analysis, fed from the bowels of a dead carcass—American freedom—to an adoring, again liberal, public and readership.

He sets up a promising background: "In the 1850s, London, the world's largest city, still didn't have a sewer system. Waste simply flowed into the Thames.... But conservatives...opposed any effort to remedy the situation. After all, such an effort would involve increased government spending and, they insisted, infringe on personal liberty and local control." Of course, familiar, except that the position is not exclusive to conservatives. Obama's visit to Detroit led to brief reference to sadness for the affected children in Flint, crocodile tears when it came to remedies beyond a small allocation of federal funds, while Snyder, in his State of the State Address, did little more: to deplore a situation, partly of one's own making, is an empty mea culpa when not accompanied by substantive change, criminal charges, especially directed against those who manipulated data and failed to carry out their responsibilities (himself, on the latter, a suitable candidate), and dealing forthrightly with health issues. Krugman: "It took the Great Stink of 1858, when the stench made the Houses of Parliament unusable, to produce action." 158-odd years later, the Michigan legislature has still not kept up with its Great Stink, almost from day one of the supply switch, discoloration and foul odor of the water was noted by residents—with nothing done.

To his credit, Krugman a) recognizes that an essential public principle is being violated, and b) sees Flint itself in a more general context. "Modern politicians, no matter how conservative, understand that public health is an essential government role. Right? No, wrong—as illustrated by the disaster in Flint, Mich." The chain of guilt extended far and wide: "What we know so far is that in 2014 the city's emergency manager—appointed by Rick Snyder, the state's Republican governor—decided to switch to an unsafe water source, with lead contamination and more, in order to save money. And it's becoming increasingly clear that state officials knew that they were damaging public health, putting children in particular at risk, even as they stonewalled both residents and health experts." Nevertheless, he omits mention of liberals and Democrats, not just conservatives and Republicans, as obviously derelict or complicit—too, health experts who could have daily taken samples of the water and, the lead content discovered, children's blood samples as well. Where I credit Krugman is on his generalization: "This story—America in the 21st century, and you can trust neither the water nor what officials say about it—would be a horrifying outrage even if it were an accident or an isolated instance of bad policy. But it isn't. On the contrary, the nightmare in Flint reflects the resurgence in American politics of exactly the same attitudes that led to London's Great Stink more than a century and a half ago."

Then he caves in, superbly revealing the limitations of liberalism, and—hopefully not a cheap shot—how the Nobel Prize in Economics is rewarded, i.e., keep it straight, avoid stepping on capitalism's toes, be respectful and respectable: in this case, take the high ground and avoid controversy by narrowing the boundaries of what it is legitimate to discuss: "Let's back up a bit, and talk about the role of government in an advanced society." Yes, let's, and in order to see the antiradical core of liberalism, elimination of VALUES wherever possible. "In the modern world," he writes, "much government spending goes to social insurance programs—things like Social Security, Medicare and so on, that are supposed to protect citizens from the misfortunes of life." One would have thought, no argument, applause from liberals! He continues: "Such spending is the subject of fierce political debate, and understandably so." Now in retreat: "Liberals want to help the poor and unlucky, conservatives want to let people keep their hard-earned income, and there's no right answer to this debate, because it's a question of values."

I submit that Flint and all that it represents is a test of liberalism, and not merely conservatism. How much courage does it take to affirm social insurance programs? And go further, seek their fuller democratization, rather than beg off on grounds of inconclusiveness? Liberal exquisite-ness of argumentation and analysis can go only so far before its emptiness is revealed—here the distinction between "public goods" and the social welfare: "There should, however, be much less debate about spending on what Econ 101 calls public goods—things that benefit everyone and can't be provided by the public sector." The trouble is, all that makes for a life which is safe, healthy, amicable, non-exploitative, can and should be considered public goods, not just those wherein values may be evident to the supposedly objective-minded economist. Democracy is a value; freedom is a value; taking a stand on the utter legitimacy of both, and working toward their fuller, more comprehensive achievement, is not grounds for ruling them out as public goods. Many things "benefit everyone," militarism not being one of them, nor crumbling infrastructure, another. Instead, the circle narrows, as though only a priori things will do: "Yes, we can differ over exactly how big a military we need or how dense and well-maintained the road network should be, but you wouldn't expect controversy about spending enough to provide key public goods like basic education or safe drinking water."

Nor would you expect the analyst/observer to hide behind basic education and safe drinking water, in order to escape from taking a stand on military-influenced capitalism and suffocation of the social safety net, let alone myriad other vital issues, such as socialized medicine—there I've said it (rather than the single-payer system)—instead of the for-profit Affordable Care Act. I surmise Krugman is a person of good will, a convinced liberal, who finds radicalism abhorrent as much as reaction, in which case ideological myopia still colors the analysis and confines his attention to attacking the Right without reckoning that the Center and Right have melded, as witness everything Obama and the Clintons represent, and together constitute shock troops for advanced capitalism and unilateral global dominance. Those poor conservatives: “Yet a funny thing has happened as hard-line conservatives have taken over many U.S. state governments. Or actually, it’s not funny at all. Not surprisingly, they have sought to cut social insurance spending on the poor. In fact, many state governments dislike spending on the poor so much that they are rejecting a Medicaid expansion that wouldn’t cost them anything, because it’s federally financed.” To summarize, Krugman finds Flint to be “an all too typically American situation of (literally) poisonous interaction between ideology and race, in which small-government extremists are empowered by the sense of too many voters that good government is simply a giveaway to Those People.”

Race is undoubtedly in the mix, but the ideology runs deeper than small-government extremists imposing their will on an equally resentful, frustrated electorate; all of America, its history, its current practice, is implicated in the poisoning of Flint.

JANUARY 28, 2016

Corporate Inversion: The American Way

Advanced capitalism is, increasingly, an international system, subdivided into consanguineous blocs, such as the EU, or given practical implementation, as in NAFTA and the still-negotiated TPP, but in reality the dominant political economies, although benefiting from, indeed, defining and structuring, cross-border flows of financial, industrial, and commercial activities, relations, and investments, use these arrangements in order to develop an independent power base and thus strike out unilaterally on the world scene for achieving global economic dominance. The internationalization of capitalism is true so far as it goes, remaining qualified at the outset by intra-capitalist rivalries classically embedded in the imperialist paradigm (for which alliance-systems provide a subduing or mitigating factor), but in its upper reaches capitalism, America the prime and virtually singular example, rests on national foundations, not least because of the locus of preponderant ownership and, greasing the wheels, a formidable military protective force in promoting expansion. America is 21st century capitalism in extremis, i.e., not so much in heightened form, as rather near the point of death (Webster’s), postponement or avoidance of which necessitates desperate moves, seemingly, but not really, noneconomic in origins, as in a broadly counterrevolutionary posture intended to shape the international order to its liking and in conformity with its ideology of unrestrained capitalism, antiradicalism, and the nuts-and-bolts policy constants of war, intervention, and regime change. On that score alone, America in the present-day is already conspicuous for its historical-structural corporatism, a systemic near-replication of what in the first-half of the 20th century had been tried and adopted in German, Italian, and Japanese fascism, where the lines between the State and Capitalism were removed in a unitary framework of government-business interpenetration.

I call that fascism, stripped of emotive content, and without necessarily invoking the existence of the concentration camp and gas chamber, because the telling feature in all of this, beyond an obviously militaristic mindset grounded in an hierarchical structure of status and power, is the corporatization of the total society: capitalism at the heart of the polity, that for which all of life is meant to serve. Capitalism and polity conterminous, no longer simply interpenetration of the two but an identity of structure and interest. America has carried this integrative process of a private-public conflation further than any other advanced capitalist power, state capitalism no longer a sufficient designation, or even capitalist state, but the state as the outer covering for capitalism proper, revealing its militaristic potential and hegemonic aspirations, tightly-bundled in a national context the better for the public realm to activate the private, inculcate patriotic devotion and submission in the people, and—bluntly—keep order. Meanwhile, capitalism’s systemic wish-list (Marxists may fall back on integral tendencies, but I prefer the more active role of ruling groups in guiding and establishing boundaries for capitalist development, hence, an indictment of class rule, if that should ever be possible if and when working people get their act together) takes on, in America, an accelerated pace for completing the agenda of utmost and complete concentration and consolidation of the corporate form. America, Inc., a land of loyal employees, compliant consumers, obedient politicians, organized, synchronized, to reflect an imperative command structure dedicated to one end, the System itself.

Nominally, corporate inversion is an accounting trick realized through mergers and acquisitions to evade taxation. Why be satisfied with the myriad loopholes, corporate executives are asking themselves, and the opportunities for taking write-offs, built into the tax code, whose top rate of 35% is seldom, very seldom, charged, half that rate more typically, making a progressive tax system a misnomer (clearly one that is regressive, even as compared to that of individuals, in the higher altitudes), when you can have TAX EVASION altogether?! Let’s stay with corporate inversion in its simple technical usage, then look briefly as above at a Capitalist Polity, the State its mere appendage: to fight its wars (trade wars included), provide bailouts for its business and banking failures, and steady its volatile stock market, based on everything from gambling blind-folded to manipulation via insider trading. To gain an overview of corporate inversion, I turn to the NYT DealBook section, Andrew Ross Sorkin’s article, “A Tidal Wave of Corporate Migrants Seeking (Tax) Shelter,” January 26, an apt title; not migrants like the Joad family in the Grapes of Wrath forced off the land and seeking opportunities perhaps in the city, but multibillion dollar entities voluntarily migrating overseas to save vast sums on their tax bills, havens the Joads will never see.

Sorkin has no illusions about the evasion tactic—this is about Johnson Controls, shock troops for the automotive industry in securing corporate bailouts, while ultimately greatly profiting for itself. “In the fall of 2008,” he writes, “with General Motors and Chrysler on the precipice of bankruptcy, executives at the car parts supplier Johnson Controls flew to Washington. The company’s president testified before a Senate panel and implored lawmakers to bail out the auto industry.” Yes, what’s good for GM (and Johnson Controls) is good for America, Keith Wandell, the latter’s president, warned that “the failure of even one automobile company would ‘implode’ the supply chain and lead to broad job losses.” We’ve heard that song before, and since—chiefly with financials; Congress gave GM and Chrysler “a bailout plan worth almost $80 billion,” Johnson and other suppliers were saved, and Johnson’s CEO in 2010 received a salary of $15 million. So far so good, for here we get a glimpse of corporate patriotism at its zenith. Sorkin writes: “Despite the federal government’s rescue—and hundreds of millions of dollars in tax breaks over the last several decades from states like Michigan and Wisconsin—Johnson Controls said on Monday [Jan. 25] it was renouncing its United States corporate citizenship by selling itself to Tyco International, based in Ireland, a deal struck in large part to reduce its tax bill, which it said should drop by about $150 million annually.”

Not unusual; here he briefly recites the honor role of tax evasion: The announcement “is just the latest effort by corporate America to flee the United States. In the last year, Pfizer said it was leaving for Ireland, as did Medtronic, the medical device maker. [More on both of these below] Coca-Cola’s largest bottling company, after selling its domestic operations, is heading to Britain.” In fact, the stampede is on, and has been in this form for at least a quarter-century, under Democratic and Republican administrations, with no resistance offered. The dynamics of what amounts to bottom-fishing, here for the lowest taxes, applies still earlier to outsourcing and lowering the labor cost of manufacturing, capitalism dedicated to cheapening every thing in sight except its own profits (the foregoing, mine, not Sorkin’s). To his credit, he states that until the tax code is reformed [wishful thinking, at best], “we will continue to see an exodus of American companies from our shores in search of a lower tax rate.” And he finds that “based on a series of conversations with investment bankers, there are probably at least another dozen deals of meaningful size being negotiated in the pipeline.” I might add, if genuinely reformed, the tax code would probably produce a universal stampede of “corporate migration,” his idea of reform being what the Treasury has approved (but I think easily gotten around), “a rule that an American company could not complete an inversion if it owned more than 60 per cent of the combined company; Johnson Controls will own 56 per cent of the combined company.”

Hmmm, how did it just come under the wire? In another NYT DealBook article, “Tyco Merger Will Shift Johnson Controls’ Tax Liability Overseas,” (Jan. 25), Leslie Picker explains the careful calculation made to legitimize the inversion. She begins: “One of the first big mergers of the new year resembles a number of other deals in recent years in one crucial respect: It will allow an American corporation to move its headquarters to a country where corporate taxes are lower.” Johnson, now combining with Tyco, “will relocate its headquarters from Milwaukee to Cork, Ireland, where Tyco is domiciled and where corporate taxes are lower than in the United States.” The reputed savings in annual tax payments, the combined companies announced, is at least $150 million. (Picker notes that the Johnson Controls-Tyco combination “is the 13th such deal to be announced in the last 16 months, according to data compiled by Dealogic.”)

Still, how did the deal get beyond the Treasury rule, where “shareholders are required to own less than 60 percent of the joint entity to pass muster for an inversion”? We left the matter at 54%-46%, and Sorkin points to some streamlining by both companies, and adds, “Right before the merger, Tyco will conduct a reverse stock split, whereby Tyco shareholders will receive a ratio of 0.955 shares for each of their existing Tyco shares.” If this seems too technical, as it does for me, Kevin Allison, also NYT DealBook, (Jan. 25), explains the mechanics of the deal, so as to satisfy Treasury guidelines: “In a complex deal that smacks of late-cycle merger action, Johnson’s own shareholders are being handed $3.9 billion in cash to reduce the share count to levels that allow a shift of tax domicile to happen.” Everyone is happy, Congress, Treasury, the respective shareholders (“Johnson is in effect paying roughly $1.4 billion above Tyco’s market value on Friday [Jan. 22]” to keep within the prescribed limits set for inversion, here Tyco owners, “hold 44 per cent of the combined company and therefore collect nearly half of any additional upside.”

Picker quotes Robert Olson, chief financial officer of Tyco, who said: “We’re well within the guidelines that the I.R.S. has established, so we feel really good on it.” Well he might, for we learn also in Picker’s article that Tyco is quite a good candidate for the Corporate Good Citizen Award (my fictional creation): It changed corporate headquarters several times (one step ahead of the law?) doing its first “inversion in 1997 by acquiring ADT Ltd., and moving its headquarters to Bermuda.” Then, “in 2009 shareholders voted to shift Tyco’s headquarters to Switzerland, and then five years later to Cork, Ireland.” A veritable Baedeker guide to Theft in the Grand Manner; fittingly, the company, started in 1960 as a small research outfit with government connections, later “growing into an industrial giant through a series of diverse acquisitions,” in the early 2000s “was marred in scandal when Dennis Kozlowski, its CEO, was convicted of looting the company.” Such is the nature of capitalism, of corporate tax evasion, of inversion; “since then, the company has been broken up several times.” Its market valuation, as of last week, was $13 billion, and S. & P.’s Capital IQ show projects its 2016 revenue at $9.7 billion. Nor is Johnson suffering; it “will receive about $3.9 billion in cash from the transaction, for which Tyco has secured about $4 billion in financing.” Added to that the savings effected in evasion (oops, inversion) and we have a good day’s work. The usual helpers, Barclays, Lazard, Goldman, provided further zest to the whole operation.

The foregoing is a useful case study, not least because of its recency, alerting us to corporate depredations going on under our very noses. But there are many others, and sticking to the recent timeline I’d like to look at two, Pfizer and Medtronic, poster candidates for the dynamics of inversion. Medtronic goes back to mid-2014. It agreed, according to NYT analyst, Michael de la Merced, in his article, “Device Maker Medtronic Agrees to Merger and Will Move to Ireland,” (June 15), “to buy Covidien for $42.9 billion, combining two of the world’s biggest medical device makers and helping Medtronic lower some taxes by gaining access to cash held overseas.” Never mind the obvious in all of these multibillion dollar transactions, in which anti-trust law and consequent prosecution are and have been for some time dead letters, for we see the interesting point that overseas cash holdings/profits are safely sheltered, even though, and when, they are reinvested back in the US. Merced writes: “The deal, which is being structured as a so-called inversion, will relocate Medtronic from its headquarters in Minneapolis to Covidien’s corporate home in Ireland, where the tax rate is significantly lower than in the United States. But Medtronic argues that its tax rate will remain roughly the same, at about 18 percent.” This is still absurdly low, given the size and scope of the merger, particularly when one notes Medtronic’s advantage of enjoying, like Pfizer as well, assorted protections of US law, such as patent rights, access to the American stock market, etc. The deal isn’t small: “Together, the two companies will become one of the biggest providers of medical devices in the industry, with 87,000 employees in over 150 countries.” At the time, the deal was “the biggest-ever foreign acquisition by an American company,” surpassing “Kraft’s $19.5 billion takeover” of Britain’s Cadbury.

Although US corporations claim to be at a competitive disadvantage headquartered in the US, where corporate tax rates are allegedly high, Merced points out that American tax laws “allow companies to move their corporate headquarters under certain circumstances [none seems unduly restrictive, if at all], leading to a growing wave of inversions.” The refrain, repeated ad nauseam by every CEO in corporate flight, that this is not about lowering (i.e., evading) taxes, can be seen in the statement of Omar Ishrak, Medtronic’s chair, ““Although this is an inversion deal, it’s not about lowering tax rates,”” claiming instead, and correctly, without I think denying the other, that “Medtronic can get access to the free cash flow that Covidien generates and deploy it in the U.S.” So, even though Covidien shareholders will have only 30 percent of the combined company, thus well within Treasury regulations, Medtronic has married a cash cow and is happily ensconced in Ireland while, with these reserves, enlarging its business in America.

Finally, there is Pfizer, a granddaddy of global pharmaceuticals, voracious in its appetite/skilled in its aptitude, for profits, maker of Lipitor, Viagra, and Botox, the Holy Grail of the American lifestyle, and if that isn't enough to win our admiration, then sheer size earns the respect of every right-thinking capitalist. Its journey leading up the events of today has not been easy, for in mid-2014 it attempted to merge with AstraZeneca and was unceremoniously rebuffed. NYT reporter Jenny Anderson has the story, “Pfizer Abandons Bid for AstraZeneca,” (May 24, 2014), affording insight into its corporate strategy to follow. She writes, “On the final day for Pfizer to decide whether to abandon the plan, it said it did not intend to make an offer for AstraZeneca.” Its final offer was rejected the previous week, I gather to Pfizer's dismay: “The cash-and-stock bid, which valued AstraZeneca at about $19 billion [more than generous, it seems], would have created the world's largest drug company.” Pfizer thinks big, it also thinks about favorable “tax domiciles,” words often appearing from all sides. Ian Read, its chair, is direct: “We continue to believe that our final proposal was compelling and represented full value for AstraZeneca.... As we said from the start, the pursuit of this transaction was a potential enhancement to our existing strategy.” He is not shy about the tax-saving rationale for corporate inversion, nor the cash accumulated for global investment via lower rates. One reason AstraZeneca held back was its belief that it finally had “promising new drugs” in the pipeline (read: predators going for the jugular), in this case, “MEDI4736, a lung cancer drug that...could be worth as much as $6 billion in peak annual sales.”

Welcome to the world of pharmaceuticals. Jumping forward to mid-November, 2015, Pfizer again on the (corporate) prowl, we see Jeff Sommer's article in the “Your Money” section of The Times, entitled, “A Tax-Cutting Move That Pfizer Can Hardly Resist,” (Nov. 14, 2015), which is like a gunshot blast: “Give Pfizer, the giant drug maker, points for boldness and persistence: The company has bravely put ‘tax inversions’ back in the headlines.” We are now up to the preliminaries with the Allergan merger: “Pfizer, which already holds roughly $140 billion overseas and is quite skillful at minimizing its taxes, is considering a deal that could move its legal tax headquarters from New York to Dublin, where it could save bundles more.” Sommers notes that Pfizer tried unsuccessfully the previous year for a “tax inversion,” and that “from a purely financial viewpoint, tax inversions make sense for companies like Pfizer,” or in other words, amoral cynicism rules the roost and one cannot expect otherwise (mine, not Sommers). Enter Allergan: “Last month [Oct., 2015], the company revealed that it was engaged in merger talks with Allergan, a smaller pharmaceutical company that operates in New Jersey but has already shifted its own tax domicile to Ireland through a tax-inversion merger.” Before Pfizer, Allergan was already in the game, perhaps ready, with its Irish tax domicile, for the next fish. Again, Ian Read. Yes, some in Congress are upset (Jack Reed of Rhode Island, to his everlasting credit) about the inversion, but so what, for Read on Oct. 27 said in a conference call: “The shareholders of Pfizer expect us to maximize the return, and the employees of Pfizer want to have a robust, successful company in the future. To be successful in the future, we need to have a competitive tax rate.”

Off to Dublin, still of course leaving the actual headquarters and operations in America intact. It is significant that Ian Read is an accountant (perhaps the coming occupational training ground for corporate CEOs), and Sommer notes, “Pfizer represents a textbook case of complex global accounting.” What is meant here, besides sophisticated tax evasion? Perhaps nothing, except that, he goes on, Pfizer “has been deftly exploiting tax anomalies for years, yet it is evidently convinced that it can do even better with a foreign tax address.” Taxation raises the question of, if not gives birth to, the multinational corporation, an argument raised (in its favor) by Roman Weil, University of Chicago professor emeritus, the Booth School of Business, whose textbook, “Financial Accounting,” 14th edition, praises Pfizer to the hilt for its “unexceptionable” work. Weil reasons (?) that US multinationals are wary about repatriating foreign profits: “It’s not surprising,” he writes, “that companies like Pfizer and G.E. want to keep those dollars abroad so they don’t have to pay those [US] taxes [which he estimates at 25%]. Sommer is quick with his rejoinder: Pfizer claims 25% as its “effective tax rate,” yet, he observes, “if you’re not an accountant, that phrase, ‘effective tax rate,’ may not mean what you think it does. It’s not what the company actually pays.... When, if ever, Pfizer would pay enough to reach 25 percent is far from clear.”

Wonderful, the clouds part. Pfizer “has sheltered $74 billion by holding it overseas and declaring that the money will remain abroad ‘indefinitely.’” Although the US government “taxes companies on their worldwide income, it doesn’t collect on earnings that remain abroad,” and in parentheses, further, and importantly, he writes: “Pfizer might be able to use its overseas cash in a merger with a foreign-domiciled company, like Allergan [the deal has not been consummated yet]. That could enable Pfizer to declare itself an Irish corporation, easing its tax problems.” Ireland, I toast thee, the leprechaun of monopoly capital, a hiding place of treasure, elf pledged not to reveal its location. One need only add: “On top of that $74 billion, Pfizer keeps an additional, unspecified amount abroad,” which Sommer calculates as another $70 billion. Our good Professor Weil thinks “tax domiciles abroad” can be advantageous to the US, encouraging multinationals to invest at home: “They might be more inclined to do so, he said, because they could book earnings abroad and bring the money back to America ‘without incurring that additional United States tax.’” In all of this, we see academic whoredom falling into step: Edward Kleinbard, former chief of staff of the congressional Joint Committee on Taxation, and now professor of law and business at Southern Cal, takes the position that “the morality of tax inversions was not an issue that C.E.O.s should even be expected to address. In his words, “There is a moral imperative here, but it falls on the shoulders of Congress, not on corporations.” Corporate self-interest, Sommer paraphrase, is an “economic model in place now,” and, again, Kleinbard, “If the results are plainly inconsistent with the national interest, Congress has to fix things [which in buck-passing fashion, he is certain it will not]. We shouldn’t expect the corporate community to hold itself to values higher than the marketplace.” A fitting epitaph for America.

Perhaps it is unnecessary to go beyond the factual material to a theoretical conclusion about the nature of corporatism, and corporate inversion as the deconstruction of an atavistic demand for profits, militarism, conquest, all resting on a submissive populace that transforms the human being into a commodity, and capitalism, far from being a political economy, takes on the dimensions of the State itself insofar as organizing the structure of social relations and keeping the people in a condition of somnambulant regimentation. The merger has now been effected, we can all rest at ease.

JANUARY 29, 2016

Domestic War Criminals: A People's Court

Criminal behavior, when legitimated by the State, introduces a new legal category, a variant of the time-honored crime of treason to one's own country, properly, a crime against humanity, turned inward, fully sanctioned by Constitution, law, and custom. Michigan has declared war on Flint, a take-no-prisoners reign of terror all perfectly NORMAL, and hence, until now, difficult to detect and/or oppose. As with practically all crimes committed under the name of law and order, the victim becomes the culprit, the perpetrator, the well-meaning administrator guilty of at most poor judgment while presumably addressing more pressing issues. That is where we're at, in 2016, although actually long in the making, in state and nation alike. This whole area of judicial determination is, of course, off-limits and non-existent, and hence continues in the name of law-and-order, stability, even progress.

Michigan is no worse than America, Governor Snyder merely a replica in miniature of President Obama; one presides over the killing of individuals on a global basis, the other, a local basis—done with the detachment and coldness of an Eichmann, a necessary reserve for conveying the idea of respectability wrapped in the cloak of office and the expected deference of a citizen base. Whether murdering children through official acts by means of drone assassination, or by means of poisoned water the outcome of decisions in place to serve a particular agenda, it does not matter, for the result is the same: infanticide, usually extended to cover collateral damage as well, a civilian population at the mercy of authoritative force. Flint is a useful illustration of the transmission of totalitarianism downward, the atmosphere of criminality at the highest levels making possible, thinkable, executable, drawing inspiration from the creative fount of lawful lawlessness, behavioral patterns otherwise unacceptable in a society governed by democratic norms.

We look to Burns, Oregon as an example of insurrection, when the real insurrection on a far wider scale is committed by government itself (revolt against a civil authority or established government, therefore America a revolt against itself, a festering self-destructiveness founded on destruction of others, the weak, the poor, the marginalized, whether at home or abroad) in Flint, as chapter one in the concerted attack on working people and racial minorities, often the same. Flint did not have to happen, and that it has happened compels a need to know and suitable punishment. But how punish Barack Obama for promoting war, intervention, regime change, in addition, CIA and paramilitary forces at the ready, for opportunities the US seeks or creates along these lines (military bases in, at one count, 147 countries, a military budget snuffing out the chances of a decent, viable, social safety net), when this record represents the history, expectations, again, normality, of citizens and government alike? And how punish Rick Snyder for promoting class war, racial division, deepening impoverishment, in addition, lifetime human deprivation as children grow to adulthood with diminished IQs, physical defects, disease and illness still uncalculated given the monstrous consequences of lead poisoning, when this record also is internally standard operating procedure for the ghettoized industrial and racial communities in America? Affluent versus immiserated, the social-structural-ideological battle continues, America a growing wasteland of class rule, deep currents of ethnocentrism and xenophobia, a political system, Michigan a carbon copy of the nation, in which the cards are so stacked against those deemed of secondary human worth, that we can expect more Flints, just as we've come to expect more Vietnams and Iraqs, the Garrison State under siege, believed to be threatened by sinister forces within and without, hell-bent on desecrating the pecking order of values—global hegemony, domestic supremacy of wealth and race—which have served for centuries as designating America’s greatness.

No, war crimes are unpunishable when the force lies largely on one side. To see Flint as a case study of genocide, as I recently suggested in CounterPunch, will find little acceptance in the US, even among Flint’s own people, who, still in a state of shock, cannot believe they have been so misused by their own state government, the emergency manager system devised exactly, in the name of fiscal responsibility, to subjugate-humiliate-renew dependence of a social base already punished, and therefor an easy prey, to manufacturing abandonment, crumbling infrastructure, starved educational and social-service needs. The veil, now torn away from Flint, reveals what is in the making throughout the country: government at every level deceiving its own people, to be docile in the face of national wealth concentration, corporate inversion (the flight abroad to realize favorable tax-domiciles), further mergers and acquisitions to solidify capitalism’s power and wealth in defining the political process, the condition of labor rights, and treatment of the environment, and docile as well, at home, where the state, trespassing on local government, abandons all pretense at safeguarding the people’s health, favoring instead vested interests which enrich themselves at the expense of a degraded citizenry.

In light of the foregoing, I have an admittedly weak response—for now, to wit, the setting up of people’s courts throughout the state, to try Governor Snyder in absentia, since recall and impeachment are unlikely, and in these proceedings make clear the criminal and illicit conduct of state and business leaders alike in bringing the community of Flint to its knees. Let the ax fall on both political parties alike (similar to a Truth and Reconciliation proceeding in countries that have escaped from or overthrown dictatorial regimes), exposing the wounds which come from consistent favoritism to business over the needs of the people: Flint the capitalist fate awaiting us all. This may not be Auschwitz, but let the world know that America and Michigan show a real contempt for their own children, destining them for early and agonizing death, where fiscal responsibility is at issue, and, added incentive, driving home discrimination and making of the discriminated object lessons in knowing their place. Today, blacks and the poor, tomorrow ... who knows whom is next? Flint is capable of establishing a chain-reaction. What can be done there, can be done in any community where the needs of capital and of the people conflict.

FEBRUARY 1, 2016

Infanticide: A Policy Choice

This is my third article on the crisis in Flint Michigan. The first, Flint: Genocide by Design, the second, Domestic War Criminals: A People’s Court. – NP

Apathy is an American social disease. We kill our own, and then look away. This is the story of Flint, a nightmare of prostituted government (literally) in the service of money via a context of political-structural debasement. I refer not so much to local authority, but state and national, an intricate web of complicity from Gov. Snyder to Pres. Obama, their respective agencies in charge of safeguarding the public health and environmental well-being of state and nation alike, in which the opposite has taken place, children the primary victim of a society indifferent to anything but capital, its ascendant role, its established wealth and power. It is too simple to say that capitalism is murdering the children of the poor, not because that is incorrect, but because several direct, intermediate steps have to be factored into the indictment, not least, the aforementioned apathy, specifically induced and/or engendered to cover over the inbred nihilism of the System.

This is too important for one to get bogged down in conspiracy theory. The interpretation now favored is a contamination crisis because of the stupidity of decision-makers at every level of government; I submit, otherwise—rather than stupidity, insert ideology, a consistent direction of public policy which neither credits the suffering of blacks (Snyder, no surprise here, issued a statement that race is not involved in the whole water-supply debacle) and the poor in general, nor accepts responsibility—moral, political, economic—for the degradation of a community that, particularly, is made up of blacks, the poor, and at its historical roots working class. The state, in effect, washes its hands of Flint, not quite the eradication of its identity and people, so much as a studied neglect and indifference which, predictably from the developments in the case, i.e., the toxic character of the river from which the water supply is taken, would result in collective punishment for the city and its residents just for representing who and what Flint is, a presumed embarrassment to state and nation, on grounds of class, race, and the inability to hold onto its manufacturing base (an oblique jab at the UAW and, for the memories of a heyday of militant labor, the suspicion of anticapitalism, whether or not justified). Flint's deterioration, and now, endangerment of the health of the community, actually, because of the long-term consequences of lead poisoning, already at the point of no return, one can see this as a case study in ideological pay-back time, a fate some mining and agricultural communities have faced absent the specific form of poisoning in Flint (mining has its own cross to bear) or possibly the threat to capitalism, easily magnified by ownership across the spectrum of production and investment when things do not go completely its way.

Therefore, Flint becomes an object lesson, viscerally, rather than conspiratorially, determined. The people and surroundings are dispensable, testimony to a two-nations' social mentality from the inception of the republic, and only intensified through industrialization, large-scale immigration, and the boldness in claiming political-market world dominance. Not merely race, which provided a learning tool for upper groups in how to establish Order once for all ensuring hierarchical patterns in defining societal place, but informal separation of the classes vital to the disciplining of a labor force. The initial Nazi business-fronts perfected the idea of soldiers-in-industry, a built-in contempt for, and desire to regiment the lives and aspirations of, working people, finds its counterpart in the reservoir of superiority necessary to maintain social control by capitalist elites. To think that the attitude I am describing is not integral to capitalism, and does not come into play with respect to national and state government authorities' treatment of Flint, foolishly takes American democracy at face value and ignores the bloody history of labor violence. Flint may well be "the final solution" to working class discontent, at any rate, given the lack of militant protest while its children face unspeakable deformities, it would seem mortally wounded verging on paralysis.

If Capital wins hands down in Flint, as now seems the case, the future does not look bright for organized labor, except within what I am terming the definition of place—a system of social-structural CLASS stratification (far more germane to modern times than race) facilitating the concentration of wealth and power from the top down. Snyder, state environmental officials, those filling the emergency-manager cadre, don't give a snap for those who have borne the brunt of their policies, their condescension, indeed, beyond patronizing, their contempt for the so-called lower orders, those who have not made it as have they, and the wealthy bankers, industrialists, developers, standing behind them. Why expect differently? Flint to them is 100,000 nobodies, with no claims on government. Instead of, let them eat cake, let them use water filters, which it turns out cannot be effective when contamination exceeds (as is now happening) a certain level. Human life is cheap, provided of course protest can be effectively neutralized. Flint is in a bind, so far as the poor are concerned, emphatically not of its own making, but of those traditionally arrayed against them and, unlike Henry James's Princess Casamassima, unwilling to share their hardship, suffering, and fear of worse hanging over them.

Here is my abbreviated version of the timeline of the Flint water crisis provided by the New York Times, with occasional interpolations. The Times begins: "Months after warning signs emerged about problems with the water in Flint, Mich., city, state and federal officials are responding to the public health emergency. High levels of lead had leached from pipes into the water supply." It continued, April 25, 2014, its first entry: "The city switches its water supply from Detroit's system to the Flint River. The switch was made as a cost-saving measure for the struggling majority-black city. Soon after, residents begin to complain about the water's color, taste and odor, and to report rashes and concerns about bacteria." Succinct, to the point, because the original supply, from Lake Huron, was pure, while the Flint River has been known as a toxic dump. What could be clearer, that not stupidity, but ideology, comes into play; and that a "cost-saving measure," defining the purpose of the emergency-manager system, in which appointment is made by the governor, superseding all local authority, also represents, as it does with the IMF with respect to European economies, the negation of democratic procedures and power-relations, for the sake of fiscal responsibility? Fiscal responsibility (aka, austerity) trumps human life—and those advocating for it, know full well the consequences. More on this by all odds fateful and pivotal decision to resort to a contaminated source for an American city's water supply later: contamination, lead poisoning, is not a species of scientific exotica. If you are running the Department of Environmental Quality (Michigan) or the Environmental Protection Agency (US), or up the ladder, the governor or president responsible for the official's appointment, the facts of lead poisoning are an open book, and everyone along the line of authority should, under any meaningful conception of the rule of law, be held accountable and regarded as the felons they are.

The Flint city government, hardly blameless, issued a news release: "Flint water is safe to drink." Then August-September 2014, The Times reports: "City officials issue boil-water advisories after coliform bacteria are detected in tap water." Band-aids would have been as good. October, Stephen Busch, a district supervisor for the state DEQ issued a statement: "The city has taken operational steps to limit the potential for a boil-water advisory to re-occur." Meanwhile, children and fetuses of the unborn are subject to poisoning, and, still October, we learn that car parts are just as vulnerable as fetuses and children: "A General Motors plant in Flint stops using municipal water, saying it corrodes car parts." One would think, enough is enough: blow the whistle on this travesty of justice. Yet, January 2015, when the situation could have been materially improved, in fact, corrected (after, however the harm had already been done—lead poisoning plays for keeps). We read: "Detroit's water system offers to reconnect to Flint, waiving a $4 million dollar connection fee. Three weeks later, Flint's state-appointed emergency manager, Jerry Ambrose, declines the offer." No excuse here, even austerity scruples overruled, suggesting the policy toward Flint was deliberate, not inadvertent, and beyond Ambrose stands Snyder, knee-deep in denial and, subsequently, sanctimonious apology before the state legislature (fully seventeen months after the story was known).

Among the memos released by Snyder, one, February 2015, already disputes the harm being done, the presumed frivolous nature of the complaints: “It’s clear the nature of the threat was communicated poorly. It’s also clear that folks in Flint are concerned about other aspects of their water—taste, smell and color being among the top complaints.” As if the complaints did not tell us something. Feb. 18, a revealing entry puts the degree of contamination into perspective, Flint being way over the line of danger to humans: “104 parts per billion of lead are detected in drinking water at the home of Lee Anne Walters.... [She notifies the EPA.] Even small amounts of lead can cause lasting health and developmental problems in children. The E.P.A. does not require action until levels reach 15 parts per billion [hers, 104 parts per billion], but public health scientists say there is no safe level for lead in water.” Feb. 26: “A water expert from the E.P.A. and the [DEQ] discuss high levels of lead found in a resident’s water sample.” By this point, criminality suffuses the official air, no response from Obama, EPA, Snyder, DEQ, in the worst tradition of stonewalling. There is no excuse for not taking action, particularly when, the next day, Miguel del Toral, an EPA expert, and one of several heroes of the story who tried to alert authorities to the harm being done, warned that Michigan, in the way it was testing the water, had understated lead levels in the water: “Given the very high lead levels found at one home and the preflushing happening in Flint, I’m worried that the whole town may have much higher lead levels than the compliance results indicated.”

Not the poisons, but Flint was being flushed down the toilet. March 3, 2015: “Second testing detects 397 parts per billion of lead in drinking water at Ms. Walter’s home.” Still no response: on March 12, we learn that “Veolia, a consultant group hired by Flint, reports that the city’s water meets state and federal standards; it does not report specifically on lead levels.” And jumping ahead to May 6, 2015: “Tests reveal high lead levels in two more homes in Flint.” On July 2 we see in microcosm agency complicity with the governing power structure, national and state (for what else could it be?): “An E.P.A. administrator tells Flint’s mayor that ‘it would be premature to draw any conclusions’ based on a leaked internal E.P.A. memo regarding lead.” This is more and more like Ibsen’s “Enemy of the People” and the poisoning of the public baths, except that Flint is paying a higher price for the cover-up. In mid-August, DEQ “tells Flint to optimize corrosion control,” that is, don’t switch to a safe source of water, just apply chemicals to the pipes to prevent leaching (supposedly extracting the poisons which, it turns out, are not confined to lead but result as well from the chemical process itself).

Now we’re coming closer to the present, each passing day an indictment of Obama, Snyder, the regulatory apparatus, either doing nothing or, in the state, deceiving the public and, worse, the residents of Flint. September 2, another one of our very few heroes: “Marc Edwards, an expert on municipal water quality and professor at Virginia Tech, reports that corrosiveness of water is causing lead to leach into the supply.” Quickly, DEQ “disputes those conclusions.” The state goes on the offensive mounting the barricades of denial. We are now at Sept. 24-25. Dr. Mona Hanna-Attisha, chief of pediatric medicine at Hurley Medical Center in Flint and assistant clinical professor at Michigan State (I accord her top laurels for showing courage and speaking out), led a group of doctors who “urges the city to stop using the Flint River for water after finding high levels of lead in the blood of children.” The Times couldn’t be more blunt: “State regulators insist the water is safe.” In fact the regulators, DEQ along with the Department of Community Health, said that inquiry into children’s blood levels of lead was becoming a “political football,” as the blame-game was on, so that responsibility could be shifted to the state itself. Then, Sept. 28, suspiciously late, Snyder claims notification of the Flint problem: “The governor is briefed on lead problems in a phone call with the state environment department and federal officials.” Note, however, his State of the State address, where he claims to apologize and state he is fully on top of the situation, is still more than three months away.

I wish I could report substantive accomplishment, but as of January 30, promises are cheap and have not been translated into action. Oct. 1: “Flint city officials urge residents to stop drinking water after government epidemiologists validate Dr. Hanna-Attisha’s finding of high lead levels.” Snyder “orders the distribution of filters, the testing of water in the schools, and the expansion of water and blood testing.” There is only one school nurse for all of Flint, and the prescribed testing is handicapped by a pitiful allocation of funds. Dec. 14: “Flint declares an emergency.” On Dec. 29, the director of DEQ resigns, and an advisory task force puts all the blame on the agency, exempting all other parties from responsibility. Jan. 16, Obama antes up $5 million taken from FEMA, and on the 20th the Michigan House approves the sum of $28 million for relief (replacing pipes alone has been estimated to cost $1.5 billion). There Flint lies, the pin cushion of class hatred and/or disdain for its people, their health, their livelihoods.

When I was growing up, in the years following World War II, there was a popular saying, one originally expressed by G.I.s in Korea: “That’s the way the ball bounces.” Fatalism, inevitability, absorbing or riding with the punch, expecting nothing more or less. By the time of Vietnam, call the mood amoral cynicism, the infliction of harm without batting an eye, burning villages, napalming civilian populations, a mindset easily corralled by business for its aggrandizement, no holds barred in the drive for capital accumulation, no matter whose ox is gored. Capitalism in full splendor, not subject—similarly, the military—to restraint of any kind, so that a president in our own time can negotiate a vast trade partnership with one hand and direct a program of drone assassination with the other, the two intimately connected by a divine license accorded America inhering in its self-deluded doctrine of Exceptionalism.

Exceptionalism not only tolerates but creates the Flint of today, antecedently, the conditions of poverty, underfinanced social services (yes, one school nurse for a large educational system), even the lack of a large food market for the entire area. If Flint were on the coast, and the Atlantic were the Aegean, we by rights should see a mass migration to European countries, the Syrians facing the military equivalent of Flint residents’ economic deprivations, the common thread here, death hovering overhead as the larger community sits back and treats the suffering casually if at all. Michigan and Washington are dialectically intertwined, each encouraging the other to adopt the manifesto (used in both senses), business as usual. This is not a partisan issue; despite an inhumane governor and legislature, both Republican, in the state, Democrats are hardly any better, coming very late to the table and with both hands tied behind their back. Ditto, the nation, except that Obama is technically a Democrat, there being inhumaneness enough to spread around, so that party differences hardly matter, particularly when the policies of both have helped to make Flint what it is today. A military budget second to none has a way of draining all compassion from society, as well as limiting the ameliorative prospects of government.

As seen above, when it comes to regulation, government is not only perfidious, it is evil, the Swiss Guard of corporatism, monopolism, and war, all in contradistinction to a defense of the people’s interest. Regulation caricatures itself, EPA, DEQ, parties to business self-regulation in which government promotes the concentration and consolidation of capitalism as foundation for a strong and powerful State, self-regulation itself the product of a co-partnership between the private and public realms. Indirectly, this speaks to the precarious condition of Flint, for the idea of public responsibility for society's welfare goes against the ideological grain of advanced capitalism, a concession of principle which opens the way to the democratic leveling of classes. Whether state (Snyder) or nation (Obama), explanations relying on conspiracy theory are crass; instead, capitalism epistemologically shapes a holistic framework of thought, difficult to break apart into sections admitting mutuality, cooperation, non-invidious social relations, along with, on the other hand, treating the individual as a commodity and viewing human life as a means to one's own exploitative ends. Rather, the capitalist mindset cherishes stability, seeks totality of ideological perspective, thus rejects as more than window dressing the harmonious dimensions of human affairs.

Let's briefly look closer at Flint vis-à-vis the forces confronting it. It has to lose, or America will never be the same again; race and class are irrelevant when stripped of motive power to effect a democratization of status and values, but when, as here, the potential—if nothing more—exists to question capitalism and the State, exposing both to do fundamental harm to the body politic, poisoning the wells of citizenship and social identity, then the time has come for upper political-economic groups to fight back in defense of their privilege. Flint is a test case for the determination of power relations in society, the legitimacy of property with its full complement of institutional-cultural support, or the public health of working people, their consciousness for acting as a class, and the shucking-off of deferential behavior. Regrettably, Flint has not thus far accepted the challenge, making for a one-sided contest of wills going to its abject defeat. Yet there has to be more. The sit-down strikes are inscribed in the city's DNA, and the dire circumstances of public policy converging on the destruction of children's health, appears to be waking up community spirit to slough off the apathy and discouragement I alluded to, thereby making government all the more resistant to social change, all the more willing, despite public-relations stunts about admitting responsibility (Snyder's State of the State address), to tough it out against what is seen, by ideological choice, as the class-enemy, blacks, the poor, or a combination thereof.

Go back to September, 2015, as reported by Goodnough-Davey-Smith's NYT article, "When the Water Turned Brown," (Jan. 23, 2016), to Dr. Hanna-Attisha's announcement of her evidence-based charge (this late in the narrative, where filters, etc., are in play), that "the number of Flint children with elevated levels of lead in their blood had risen alarmingly since the city changed its water supply the previous year," and one finds, what?—stonewalling by the authorities, denial, even attack on her character. Within hours of her news conference, they write, the Department of Health and Human Services declares the findings false, DEQ calls her remarks, "unfortunate," the concern over Flint's water, "near-hysteria," and argues DEQ has met for months "state and federal standards." That may be true, but what does that say about the standards? Goodnough, et. al, capture the human drama of those who buck the system: "Dr. Hanna-Attisha said she went home that night feeling shaky and sick, her heart racing. 'When a state with a team of 50 epidemiologists tells you you're wrong,' she said, 'how can you not second-guess yourself?'" When I title this paper, "Infanticide: A Policy Choice," do I, despite its harshness, exaggerate? Only this month does the governor, in mock-contriteness, admit the validity of Dr. Hanna-Attisha's findings.

By way of further detail and recapitulation, one sees deliberateness in the pattern, not the willful poisoning of Flint's children and the community as a whole, but the indifference to their fate when the procedures and protocols followed were certain to yield a horrifying outcome, an indifference grounded in the last analysis in an hierarchically-structured capitalist system which views with contempt the underlings generated by it, blacks and the poor reduced to ciphers of no-account, Flint therefore a living laboratory of class attitudes and policies full-pedal ahead in ignoring harm done its already-marginalized who are dimly viewed as impediments to Empire and Greatness. The reporters add, in light of last-minute admissions by the governor and state officials, “Yet interviews, documents and emails show that as every major decision was made over more than a year, officials at all levels of government acted in ways that contributed to the public health emergency and allowed it to persist for months. The government continued on its harmful course even after lead levels were found to be rising, and after pointed, detailed warnings came from a federal water expert, a Virginia Tech researcher and others.” Ideologues have blocked ears, whether Snyder or the emergency manager who approved the switch in the water supply. And they continue: “And through it all, officials persisted in playing down and dismissing the concerns of Flint residents—one referred to concerned residents groups as ‘anti-everything’—and authoritatively vouching for the water’s purity, even as they themselves were debating whether it was pure.” Amoral cynicism, anyone?

There is no need to drag out the story. Beyond lead contamination (then Flint mayor, in June 2014, Dayne Walling, told the Flint Journal, about the water, “‘It’s a quality, safe product,’”), there were other problems, which may have distracted from the discussion of the lead (misery comes in bundles): “At points, the city’s water tested positive for E. coli bacteria.... City officials pumped extra chlorine into the system to address the bacteria issue, which led to elevated levels of total trihalomethanes, or TTHMs, chemical compounds that may cause health problems after long-term exposure.” February 2015, a state briefing: “the TTHM was ‘not nothing’ but also not an imminent ‘threat to public health.’” July 2015, “Flint sent residents a letter saying it was ‘pleased to report’ the ‘water is safe.’” Can one blame Flint residents for being disheartened and believing that officials all along the line had betrayed them? That can be a dangerous mix, going either way—demoralization or rebellion, at this point still too early to tell. In the words of one mom, whose children already developed sores and lesions, and who was particularly worried about the long-term effects of lead on her learning-disabled eleven-year-old, stated: “‘My trust in everybody is completely gone, out the door. We’ve been lied to so much, and these aren’t little white lies. These lies are affecting our kids for the rest of their lives, and it breaks my heart.’”

With cynicism and indifference also comes hypocrisy. Liam Stack reports in The Times article, “Michigan Gave State Employees Purified Water as It Denied Crisis, Emails Show,” (Jan. 29), that while Snyder’s administration throughout most of 2015 claimed that Flint’s “tap water was safe to drink,” emails released on the 28th “suggest the state was concerned about its own employees’ exposure to the city’s water as early as January of last year, even arranging for purified water to be provided at a state office building there.” Bureaucrats first, citizens last. Stack writes: “The emails depict an exchange that month [January 2015] between employees of two state departments [DEQ and Michigan Department of Technology, Management and Budget—they knew already!] that expresses concern about the water’s safety within the Michigan government long before Mr. Snyder acknowledged to residents in the fall that there was a problem.” Lonnie Scott of Progress Michigan charged favoritism involved here: “‘While residents were being told to relax and not worry about the water, the Snyder administration was taking steps to limit exposure to its own building.’” As early as January 9, 2015 we see the flow of emails, a facility notification to DEQ about the State Office Building in Flint (which sits, ironically, on the banks of the much-polluted Flint River), the dispatch of water coolers to each floor—the “email thread” also indicating concern about “unsafe levels” of TTHM in the water. Snyder, two days ago, on Detroit radio, said “he was unaware state employees in Flint had been given purified water starting in January 2015.” Stack, you can sense the futility and game-playing, writes: “Mr. Snyder has said he is committed to fixing the problem [how do you fix the poisoning already occurring in little children?] but he has so far not said when it would be safe for Flint residents to drink tap water without using a filter. He has also declined to say when thousands of water service lines in the city that are made of lead would be replaced, a key step toward convincing the public that it is safe to drink from the tap.”

Finally, let’s not be squeamish, let’s take the plunge into the tainted water supply. Things may be far worse than I’ve made out. Abby Goodnough’s NYT article, “Flint Weighs Scope of Harm to Children Caused by Lead in Water,” (Jan. 29), describes Dr. Hanna-Attisha’s investigations, examination of children and interviews with parents (her current estimate of children exposed to lead poisoning “could number 8,000”). Goodnough soberly observes: “Of all the concerns raised by the contamination of Flint’s water supply, and the failure of the state and federal governments to promptly address the crisis after it began nearly two years ago, none are more chilling than the possibility that children in this tattered city may have suffered irreversible damage to their developing brains and nervous systems from exposure to lead.” This is further reinforced by the fact “that recent tests of unfiltered water in Flint had found levels of lead in some samples higher than what filters distributed to residents were designed to remove.” Some US Public Health Service samples revealed “levels [of lead] higher than 150 parts per billion,” when EPA guidelines declare that “lead in drinking water should be below 15 parts per billion,” and Flint filters supposedly “remove lead up to 150 parts per billion.” Lead, I’m sorry to say, is UNSAFE at any level, and even the assistant secretary of the US Public Health Service, Nicole Lurie, in charge of preparedness and response, sought to downplay the significance of the findings.

The cards are stacked against Flint (and communities, including sections of larger metropolitan areas, like it): “Residents and advocates have expressed outrage over the government’s failure to protect Flint’s children, something many of them say would not have happened if the city were largely white. Adding to their injury, they say, are the harsh conditions of poverty that have already placed obstacles in their young lives.” Too, the future, “when the effects of consuming lead-laced water for months may be all too evident.” Dr. Hanna-Attisha, with her Hurley Children’s colleagues, is “scramble[ing] to put in place the resources so that every child who needs extra help learning or overcoming medical problems will have support for years to come.” Sadly, I fear, the future is here, and it is too late. Consider the reporter’s words: “Decades of research have found that exposure to even low levels of lead can profoundly affect children’s growth, behavior and intelligence over time. Studies have linked elevated lead levels in blood to learning disabilities, problems with attention and fine motor coordination, and even violent behavior.” Goodnough adds, “Younger children and fetuses are especially vulnerable because of their developing brains and nervous systems, which is why the efforts here will focus on children 5 and younger.” Dr. Hanna-Attisha may be like a modern-day Sisyphus, but hardly for want of trying—she is everywhere, yet encountering a mindset, as that of the state nurse who, revealed in one of the emails to the governor’s office, told a Flint resident this month, “regarding her son’s elevated blood lead level, ‘It is just a few IQ points.... It is not the end of the world.’”

No big deal. Dr. Hanna-Attisha dissents; she and others “who have studied lead poisoning have a sharply different view of lead exposure, for which there is no cure.” Her own words deserve to be plastered across Snyder’s Ann Arbor condo: “If you were going to put something in a population to keep them down for generations to come, it would be lead.” (Incidentally, a demonstration in front of his condo has been called for Feb. 3.) Not only the obstructive mindset (increasing degrees of false consciousness as one descends the wealth-ladder, those, like the state nurse, identifying with those above), but material conditions facing the residents of Flint, indicate the enormity of the problem—and perhaps the sadistic impulse driving it home: “Underlying the problem [the poisoning of generations to come] are the troubling conditions prevalent among low-income children and their families in cities like Flint: spotty access to doctors and health care services; a dearth of healthy foods; living conditions so poor that many of the children may have already been exposed to lead poisoning from the paint in their homes; parents with limited time and financial resources.” So, doctors’ focus would be on improving children’s diets, Head Start preschool programs (Flint’s already has a waiting list), and Dr. Hanna-Attisha’s Pediatric Public Health Initiative, bringing together psychologists, child development experts, and nutritionists. But to what avail, given the permanent damage done to children? She states at one point, “Our kids are already rattled by every kind of toxic stress you can think of. Every single day in our clinic we have a 40 percent no-show rate, and it’s not because parents don’t love their children.” She and others urge “families to feed their children foods rich in calcium, iron and vitamin C, which can help minimize the amount of lead their bodies absorb.” Back to the Sisyphus syndrome, the damage is done, continually eating away at the child’s vitals. More: “Yet that raises another problem [as noted before]: Flint is a food desert, with no large grocery stores within the city limits.” One of the mother’s she interviewed lamented: “Instead of them donating all this water, what can they do about the pipes? What can they do?”

What can America do?

JUNE 24, 2016

Fissures in World Capitalism: the British Vote

The collapse of world markets is telling evidence of capitalism’s stake in maintaining a renewed Cold War, indispensable to its logic of global confrontation as a sustaining developmental force and dependence on a disproportionate, heavy-laden defense sector for America and drawing in its allies. The European Union, historically, was first and foremost the economic underpinning to solidify NATO, itself from first to last an obviously military alliance. Together, EU and NATO represented America’s stalking horse in its posture of world intervention and counterrevolution. Obama’s “pivot” to the Far East, his Pacific-first geostrategic framework, complements and extends the US geopolitical vision of global, unilateral dominance—military, ideological, economic.

With Britain’s vote, we see a magnificent—even if Britons voted on other grounds—objective determination to put a roadblock into the American Grand Design of universalizing its own brand of monopoly capitalism (and heading off a projected nuclear holocaust), in which systemic financialization erodes and supplants the US manufacturing base via outsourcing, foreign investment, and securing predictable sources of raw materials, including of course oil.

Consternation and worse reigns supreme in both the capitalist and defense communities, the architectural splendor of simultaneous containment, even isolation, of Russia and China, now on hold, yet hardly surrendered, as America, for its own self-identity, reified the idea of the Pervasive Enemy to accompany its doctrine of Permanent War. Blowback, after all, has some validity, as America's warmongers pressed too far: Obama's modernization of the nuclear arsenal, provocative incursion in the South China Sea, pressures on NATO to occupy the borderlands of Russia. Whether or not inadvertent, Britons have thwarted the US move toward the greater fascistization of a once-democratic polity, yet no longer recognizable as such.

How will America react to the British vote? Probably by intensifying, as is already happening, its Cold War rhetoric, and translating that into more aggressive policies of containment vis-a-vis a growing list of enemies presumed waiting in the wings. Counterterrorism, which has become a catch-all for creating a mindset for ideological conformity, will be a useful instrument for confusing radicalism and terrorism, in order to suppress the former as in Latin America and Africa. Secretly, I suspect, American policy makers hoped for the Britain-EU outcome, so as to beef up European defenses, continue the rearming (encouragement of a nuclear capability) of Abe's Japan, and feel relief in pursuing the abominable policy of armed drone targeted assassination.

My Comment in The New York Times on Erlanger's article, "Britain Votes to Leave E.U.," follows:

Delighted! There has been such evasiveness about the meaning of the campaign. British exit from the EU is a vote AGAINST the renewed Cold War. The elephant in the room is NATO. Obviously, the EU is its economic counterpart, and was never conceived in isolation as a mere trading bloc.

With Britain out, hopefully others will follow, the EU will tighten its ship as an economic union and NATO, now presently at Russia's borders, will be forced to rethink its dangerous course.

Britain did the right thing, even if only intuitively; for only in the defense establishment of the West was the true nature of the vote, and its implications, discussed. Yes, if NATO unravels, along with an EU unravelling, the world will be a step closer to peace and the avoidance of a nuclear holocaust.

I'm ashamed that Corbyn didn't see this, or worse, did, but has been less than frank. Now, Britain, for the first time since the end of World War II, can break its dependence on the US and perhaps, just perhaps, lead the world on a middle course away from bipolarization.

I am thrilled by the results—the ticking clock toward WAR has been slowed down, until perhaps good sense can prevail.

JUNE 30, 2016

Economic Nationalism vs. Globalization: Janus-Faced Monopoly Capital

This week the conflict surfaced of the presumed difference between Trump's economic nationalism and Clinton's globalization, the former thought in the liberal media a betrayal of enlightened internationalism (similar to the condemnation of Britain's exit from the EU) and, on the side of constructive economic statesmanship, a world order of free trade and peaceful harmony. The Great Obfuscation: Both are mere alternative strategies to ensuring US unilateral global hegemony, to be realized through military power and a geopolitical framework of counterrevolution. Trump and Clinton feed from the same Wall Street trough. Both are imperialist, their differences cosmetic, confrontational with respect to Russia and China, unquestioning about America's right to dictate the conditions, acceptance, and demand for systemic legitimacy of world capitalism (under, of course, US leadership).

Foreign policy is the elephant in the room, more decisive than domestic policy, though crowded off the stage (both Sanders and Warren conspicuous by their silence) in defining America's progression down the road to fascism. Trump and Clinton both have willing accomplices to that end in a white working class that, unlike fifty-sixty years ago possessed the democratic vitality for preserving and pushing further a radical agenda of social welfare, and now a kept class ideologically beaten down so far as to throw in its lot with the forces of reaction and, in trickle-down fashion, upper capitalism itself.

Whether Trump rejects Nafta and TPP or Clinton accepts them, discounting for rhetorical flourishes, each wants an hierarchical social order favoring economic consolidation, the interpenetration of government and business to ensure the farcical nature of the regulatory process, and environmental degradation through lax standards and winking at corporate abuse. In sum, both, in close embrace, have a seat on Obama's lap—the National Security State as a shill for corporatism in America.

Meanwhile, the Left has been noticeably quiet, or perhaps no longer exists as the fighter for peace and social justice, tied up in knots by the flight to the culture wars as a substitute for engaging in the struggle to democratize foreign and domestic policy. America has become the bastion of Reaction, quibbling, as in this election, over how best to maintain dominance abroad, a class system in denial of its basic inequality at home. Why not fascism? For many in society the name is off-putting, but the spirit of authoritarianism is not, nor the viciousness in defending capitalism against all comers. The nation is further away from democracy than ever before. Anti-immigrant feeling is an excellent indicator; callousness to human suffering, the detachment that sees only Americans as capable of bleeding, that universal humanity is some sort of Left-propaganda, that no child should experience privation, a subversive principle, shame on what we've become.

It would be less hypocritical if there were a Trump-Clinton ticket (either one on top) devoted to military supremacy and capitalist peak-intensity, than what we have at present. And those of us fooled by Sanders and Warren, nibbling at the edges of the Left while leaving the essential conditions intact for a corporate-financial-military unified ruling group to guide US policy, have still not reacted to the obvious betrayal. The two parties have proven their underlying similarity, white workers split between them, forming a bridge to the homogenization of American politics steps closer to, beyond what once was termed plutocracy, a feel-good cauldron of hate waving the banner of exceptionalism.

JULY 11, 2016

Massacre in Dallas: America, the Ungovernable

Blowback doesn't just happen with America's global intervention; it happens here as well—and based on the same political-structural-ideological dynamics. Anticommunism, the rigid fixation defining the American world-view for over a century, creates an authoritarian atmosphere in which racism, xenophobia, ethnocentrism thrive, already overlaid on the foundations of a mature capitalism dependent for its functioning on militarism and class division (a grossly uneven distribution of wealth and power). This does not excuse the murder of police officers in Dallas. It helps to explain the context for its occurrence.

Violence gnaws at the national soul, a unified fabric of psychodynamics created at the outset by US counterrevolutionary engagements and practices throughout the world. Capitalism joined to militarism as mutually reinforcing agencies of hegemonic stabilization, seen in peak intensity in the American experience, profoundly affects, justifies, legitimates what goes on internally in society. What happened in scorched-earth policies in Vietnam, torture and murder at My Lai, waterboarding and rendition today, cannot but further depersonalize and, as with armed drone assassination, desensitize the political culture—to the extent that even the oppressed take on the features of the oppressor.

No, the assassin in Dallas is not thereby exonerated; beyond murdering officers, he or they defiled a peaceful march by demonstrators themselves protesting police brutality, whether Louisiana and Minnesota or the innumerable cases of daily humiliation in which white police officers have beaten down and sometimes murdered black citizens. This was not an act of revolutionary violence, but a crude imitation of falling into the abyss of white hatred and nihilism. In fact, less an imitation than an internalization of the mindset of the oppressor, the real consequence of a fascistic mode of social control and racism.

America descends into a hellish framework, which corrodes and poisons all within it, even the innocent of wrongdoing, and the victims of abuse, exploitation, arrogance, and pride, due to its infliction on other peoples and its own population as well of a projection of contempt of what is specifically human, life-giving, selfless, no longer to be found in its own identity and aspiration. But the extermination-urge directed outward, lest it return home as self-hatred, cannot go on indefinitely without provoking irremediable damage in every way. We are seeing that now with the renewal of the Cold War and its mirror image, the impulse to kill with impunity those in America who do not measure up to the patriotic standards of whiteness, affluence, conformity.

Patriotism is everywhere, pushing to the borders of Russia (US-dictated NATO strategy) and to battle groups in the South China Sea (Obama's Pacific-first geopolitical reorganization of the global system) from an encrusted American fear of losing its unilateral chokehold on the world system. Better dead than red, better collective destruction than a multipolar and decentralized international order based on mutual respect and social justice—an order specifically and directly antithetical to US needs, values, continued prosperity.

A crazed gunman killed five officers in Dallas and wounded others. A crazed bipartisan leadership, coalesced with financial and business elites, and military brass, kill in seconds around the clock the same or greater number. Is it possible that if the latter did not happen, neither would we see more of the former? I have implied that violence is contagious; to go further, it is also causative, particularly when legitimate authority takes the lead and sanctions rules which filter down to the rest of us. Rules such as, show no quarter; brutality is next to godliness, when the (self-approved and self-defined) cause is just—which it always is.

JULY 15, 2016

Authoritarian Politics: Trump, Clinton, and Neo-Fascism

Joseph Sohm | Shutterstock.com

Confessore's article, "For Whites Sensing Decline, Donald Trump Unleashes Words of Resistance," in The Times (July 13), is a well-researched indictment of white working-class ethnocentrism, xenophobia, and psychopathological anxieties and hatreds about the seeming loss of economic, political, racial status in America. Of course, white dominance remains far-reaching, much of the fear is opportunistic (designed to vent aggression with impunity), and is stimulated and guided in some measure by Trump's carefully planned statements, hints, and innuendoes. The fascistic context of his campaign is half-contrived, half-real, but in both cases testifying to a receptive populace already predisposed to war and reactionary social policy.

Trump would be nowhere, if the country were not supportive of self-debasement and self-pity ready to spring out and be translated into the vilest social ethic of superiority since World War II. How did this come about? Capitalism in America requires nothing less for its identity and performance. The proof of this is that Clinton and her supporters are little better, little to distinguish the two protagonists and the major parties they represent: a muscular world presence by divine right, superimposed on a class-driven society thoroughly intensified by inequality, wealth concentration, a combined ruling group of business-government-military elites integrated through maintaining a common purpose.

Trump and Clinton are each cheek in the Janus-faced Obama, himself the Great Betrayer of what remains of the American democratic spirit, increasingly dormant since the New Deal. Thus, the present impasse affecting America's humane future could have been easily predicted through tracing the historical course beginning with Truman, with little respite in the internal workings of capitalism and a foreign policy determined on unilateral prerogatives to order the global framework to its liking. Normalcy is repression, turned into gnawing resentment and a call to action—violence ever ready to disgorge its fury. At this point, neither candidate or party offers an alternative to societal decay cloaked in the amassing of unprecedented power to ward off decline from hitherto aggressively-wrought superiority. The world is now multipolar, which the US finds intolerable and the refutation of its exceptionalism.

When we look at Confessore's article, it becomes apparent how far a white working class is descending into a Nazi-like mindset, covering the usual ground of racial and ethnic hostility to what- and whom-ever is deemed the Other. Trump is the Pied Piper leading them over the cliff, while Clinton in desperation attempts a reversal of course hoping her combined capitalism-militarism goes unnoticed, but not so much as, always giving signs of her studied toughness, to lose a hold on the same constituency. Of the two, she may be the more dangerous (with major war an almost certainty) because drenching herself in liberal rhetoric. Sanders's endorsement merely adds to the intended swindle and false consciousness directed to the electorate.

Whites, we read, resent blacks, Latinos, immigrants per se, and the list grows, a resentment toward everyone except those responsible for exploiting them, to which they come hat in hand to do their bidding. Anglin's "The Daily Stormer" spews white nationalism and anti-Semitism, vying with Spencer's own white nationalism congratulating Trump for "bringing identity politics for white people into the public sphere in a way no one has," while Trump sarcastically says he disavows them, and the others coming out of the woodwork to savor their popularity. And Trump retweets many of the hate messages. The danger in all of this is the American receptivity to fascism, but perhaps the equal danger lies in Clinton's liberalization of fascism, spread across a wider terrain, taking in confrontation with Russia and China. Obama has been an excellent instructor for both candidates, with nuclear modernization, massive surveillance, curtailment of civil liberties—so whomever wins in November, the American public will be stepping into the same stream several yards further. There are rough times ahead.

JULY 27, 2016

Sanders, Our Tony Blair: A Defamation of Socialism

a katz | Shutterstock.com

Like Blair, Sanders is a pathetic lapdog, settling cozily into the lap of Clinton, Harridan of War and Militarism, Whoremonger of Wall Street, Ambition-Driven Power-Seeker. It doesn't get any worse, the betrayal of principle that, given his quick, abject submission, makes one doubt his radicalism from the start. Again like Blair he perfected the rhetoric of labor rights, yet driveled off into meaningless protestations of wanting a political revolution (which even Blair realized to be a giant disconnect). And for both, the same status-quo foreign policy of warmed over Cold War and confrontation with Russia and China.

Speaking to the Convention tonight serves to legitimate its prearranged agenda, its shabby ticket, its claims to being a progressive alternative to Republican neo-fascism. I would have preferred seeing him standing outside with his followers who he brazenly deceived, and risk arrest over principle—principle: peace, social justice, single-payer health care, strict and severe curtailment of corporate and banking monopolization and power, environmental rigor, all, inside the Convention, being operationally contemned, neglected, destroyed (with the same phony rhetorical flourish of seeming progressivism).

The two party system never looked this bleak before, Trump, the Mussolini of our time, Clinton, everything rotten and deplorable one can say about a purported Centrism spilling over the line to Far Right reactionary policies maintaining and intensifying a Class-State. There is little to choose between the candidates or their parties—when push comes to shove, a militarized plutocracy, already far along, carried further. On July 23, before I became aware of the WikiLeaks revelations, I wrote the following Comment to the New York Times:

Clinton-Kaine is hardly an alternative to Trump-Pence. Both parties and their candidates resonate on the synthesis of militarism and hegemony, and differ marginally on social-welfare legislation and programs. America thereby confirms its Rightist orientation to public policy, starting with outsize military budgets and a push to deregulation and privatization.

I pity Wall Street, having to choose between two peas in a pod both eager to serve its interests. Indeed, Clinton is merely Trump in all but party label.

The seeming difference between nationalism (Trump) and internationalism (Clinton) is spurious; both sides are interventionist and confrontational. I suspect the further growth in global tensions, whichever candidate wins.

America has been bereft of leadership for much of the time since FDR, a bipartisan demiurge of mediocrity and belligerence. The future hardly looks favorable to rule of law and human rights; instead, targeted assassination the current symbolization—and who knows what other moral abomination lies down the pike?

Aaron Blake, in the Washington Post (July 24), compiled a list of “the latest, most damaging things in the DNC’s leaked emails.” Parenthetically, the leaks have been blamed by party officials on Russia, using a familiar red-baiting technique to divert attention from the actual content of the emails. If Putin had single-handedly pulled off the caper, this still would not change the obvious sabotaging of the Sanders campaign, a crime of duplicity easily the match of Watergate. And now, Putin and Russia, according to Clinton spokespeople (repeatedly endlessly by television guests in her camp), are favorably inclined to Trump and interfering in US domestic politics. Who needs the Democrats’ use of tried-and-true McCarthyism when Joseph Stalin will do?

Wasserman Schultz, DNC chair, is especially culpable in using the Committee to favor Clinton, despite the expectation that it should take a strictly neutral stand on the candidates. Knowing the favoritism shown—(e.g., bad-mouthing Sanders as an atheist, to be used in religious settings like Kentucky), Clinton, her campaign team, Wasserman Schultz, the DNC, all consistently casting doubt on his person, ideas, viability—Sanders’s firm endorsement of “the presumptive nominee” speaks volumes about his capitulation, to the disappointment of those who believed in him. (That he was booed by his own supporters when he mentioned Clinton this afternoon, was indeed heart-warming.)

Wasserman Schultz complained (late April) to party officials about Sanders’s concern over fair treatment: “Spoken like someone who has never been a member of the Democratic Party and has no understanding of what we do.” If only that were true, rather than the camp follower he has become! And Marc Elias, the Clinton campaign lawyer, sought to discredit him (early May), suggesting “the DNC put out a statement saying that the accusations [of] the Sanders campaign are not true.” He added, “the DNC should push back DIRECTLY at Sanders and say that what he is saying is false and harmful to the Democratic party.” That was the time to fight back, the party’s stacked cards against him already an open secret.

Then we find Mark Paustenbach, DNC national press secretary, charging (late May) that Sanders “never had his act together, that his campaign was a mess.” It’s all Sanders’s fault; the DNC, Clinton, the party, appear as the product of immaculate conception in this telling. Too, Clinton and the party discouraged candidate debates, denying Sanders exposure and the chance to make his case. Everything about the campaign appears ugly, biased, yes, rigged, and yet Sanders endorses Clinton and is complicit in promoting the party's fortunes. I would regard that decision as, groveling in the dirt.

The most charitable thing I can say is, he lacks the courage of his convictions. And since courage and convictions go together, I'm not certain of the latter. He and Blair both have danced around the May Pole of democratic socialism, each reducing its visions of equality, equity, anti-militarism, and humaneness to a shambles. Meanwhile, the term "Berniebro" is being used within Democratic circles as a scare term whose associations can be readily filled in.

Consider the party, its moral collapse beginning right after World War II, and certainly by the time of Kennedy, in which it subsisted on a diet of anti-communism as the gristle for political advancement. Foreign policy was a travesty, the more seeming "liberal" domestically, the more cutthroat, from Lyndon Johnson to Bill Clinton and beyond, abroad, the result being to vitiate the record in both spheres. So why be surprised today, with Obama and Hillary Clinton—and, to go a step further, so poisonous the roots and heritage of the party in wallowing in anti-communism that it has affected Sanders as well. Try as one might for any sustained, critical analysis of foreign policy on the part of Sanders, and one gets in return the claptrap of a political revolution, to change the subject.

By virtue of his attendance and participation at the Convention, Sanders provides an objective (if unintentional) mea culpa, a formal acknowledgment of personal fault or error. Perhaps, knowing as he and everyone else knew, that the Democratic party was hopelessly corrupt, a willing agency of Cold War, business aggrandizement, surveillance, he should have gone Third Party from the beginning, affirmed proudly the American socialism of Debs, at the least, and/or professed the need for structural reconstruction and social transformation making common cause with socialism on a global basis. He should also have showed unremitting opposition to Obama, and, the most egregious hole in his armor, step forward, formulate and expand on a foreign policy worthy of democratic socialism and international peace. Even his candidacy, as he allowed it to play out, reduces him to a minor role in a totalitarian show trial, now put on exhibition, permitted to have his say, on condition of humbling himself before the capitalist-military deities calling the shots.

As he reached the podium, I wondered, will there ever be a Left again in America, not that Sanders is a worthy standard-bearer, but serving as an object lesson for the here and now, would radicalism take hold, not just at the leadership level, but a true mass base capable of unifying working people into a cohesive class-spearhead for structural and social change? The PEOPLE matter, not the politicians, and surveying the present American scene, the prognosis for the democratization of wealth and power in America looks bleak. (I this afternoon watched Al Sharpton being interviewed on MSNBC, the stale air of Clinton-ism coming through loud and clear.)

We await. In the afternoon, when he was booed by supporters for urging they vote for Clinton and Kaine (himself an abominable choice, the conservative Virginian), Sanders said: "Brothers and sisters, this is the real world that we live in." If that's the case, why then run? There is not a transcendent bone in his body. Now, more of the same, the refurbished lesser-of-two evils argument, addressed to those who believe change is still possible. The let-down of those who worked for him is palpable. Sanders is a puppet, with no one pulling the strings, the debacle his own creation. That he speaks with such urgency indicates one trapped behind the walls of his own self-importance—too banal to be thought treachery.

The air is thickened throughout the day with calls for unity, in this context, a despicable word, code for silence, submission, look-the-other-way, take pride in America as it is, not as it might be—a call to arms, literally, embracing such Democratic policies as armed drones for targeted assassination, pushing NATO by every means possible right up to the borders of Russia, patrolling the waters off China with aircraft-carrier battle groups, and planning and executing paramilitary operations which clear the way for regime change, expanded spheres of influence, market penetration, the whole dirty deal.

Does Sanders protest against all or any of these US activities, activities his designated candidate, Clinton, has favored, and POTUS has carried forward. Unity! By all means, for otherwise lies world communism steamrolling over and pulverizing The Homeland, an act of treason committed by anyone who fails to toe the line. The hour approaches.

Let's listen. Not a word on foreign policy. Praise for Obama, thankful he pulled us out of depression. A veritable orgasm of cheerleading for Clinton, more than any other speaker before the Convention. Unashamed toadying. Worse, outright falsification of positions taken, as in his litany, Hillary Clinton knows, Hillary Clinton understands.

Wall Street brought to its knees by one who received $700,000 from Goldman for a pair of feel-good speeches? Sanders creates a magical hypothetical of Clinton's positions bearing no relation to reality, whether on health care or banking regulation, or countless other issues ticked off. Yes, we disagreed during the primaries—but “that is what democracy is all about.” And now, we can march into the future together, one nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all. What a con job—and not a peep out of his supporters on the floor. A euphoric experience in deceit and cruelty.

JULY 29, 2016

Clinton Incorruptible: An Ideological Contrivance

Goldman got its money's worth at the Convention, $700k for two speeches, more a promissory note on behalf of the entire Wall Street community for continued support when and if she is elected president. Clinton, an engine of self-promotion that never turns off, makes Trump's self-promotion infantile, tiresome, and dyspeptic by comparison. A coinciding of personas, public and private, is difficult to hide, ambition-driven translating into hawkish militarism, the mutilation of national healthcare, friend to corporate and financial vested interests, outclassing Trump in service to monopoly capital.

Was the Democratic party hypocritical in nominating Clinton for the presidency? Hardly. Its own record on war, health insurance, corporatism stands out, with the exception of the New Deal, since Kennedy's time with comparable stands going back to Wilson, and before that, Grover Cleveland—a sordid promotion of anticommunism and red-baiting to cover its sins of omission and commission in opposing a society of authentic human welfare. Now, somehow, a woman crashing the glass ceiling—never mind her reactionary bent and danger to world peace—fits perfectly the the scenario of constant obfuscation, as the concentration of wealth-and-power as a unified structural syndrome continues apace.

The desexualization of gender, as proving herself one of the boys (the Afghanistan surge) and continually in evidence wherever paramilitary operations, regime change, and provocative confrontation with Russia and China has been involved in recent years, gives her high credence in Pentagon circles. And her affinity for Clintonian economics, shoulder to shoulder with Bill, and in willing company with Geithner, Summers, and the neoliberal onslaught, adds a dose of steeliness, in the face of widespread poverty and economic class-differences, to her pseudo-masculinity when it comes to displaying reserves of, and readiness to use, power with impunity.

Game-changer, according to Bill? Quite possibly, if her ruthlessness becomes operable, as surely it would, in the advancement of public policy. But that is not what he meant, for as con man (only rivaled by Obama), he credits her with a softness, delicacy, caring-ness, devotion to the cause of children, motherhood, consoling voice to the grieved; he pulls out all the stops in fallacious image-building, a Mother Theresa in pantsuit. Goddess of War and Privilege is more like it, and positively appealing to an America itself increasingly authoritarian, so that in the coming election, it is not that she is a woman but that she shows greater determination and strength in full-scale resumption of the Cold War that proves her winning attraction.

Already the propaganda machinery is cranking out a Trump-Putin hidden relationship, not only to divert attention from her own deviousness (especially the content of the privately-retained emails), but to make her the only safe guardian of American security. Power-woman has little relation to gender-equality and –justice because it reduces identity to a nameless, sexless basis of raw destructiveness. (Children in American—what of the countless children murdered overseas via armed drone targeted assassination, with not a word of protest from her.) She plays the gender card the way Obama played the race card to gain office—utter cynicism, the cultivation of a non-menacing aspect, in both cases making identity politics an utter scam by which to further the worst features of plutocratic-militaristic capitalism in America.

And the masses shout hosannas. A Clinton-Trump election is an uncanny replication of the nation's heartbeat, one that verges on nascent fascism proceeding quickly to a full-scale reproduction. Both Clintons are equally reprehensible to Bush II and Trump in that regard, as measured on that standard, and the major parties they respectively represent, likewise. Who is to blame? Not the candidates alone, and not even the parties as self-sufficient agents of causation. It is us, all of us, either directly engaged in, or directly and indirectly benefiting from, imperialism, militarism, privatization, and a spirit of nihilism (particularly as concerns climate change and the environment), that has thrust candidates and both parties alike into positions of legitimacy and prominence, despite—and actually because of—their contemptuous record on, and regard for, human welfare.

Measured by the stabilization and enlargement of capitalism, in America, but more important, also as an exclusive world system, free from socialism, peoples' democracies, formal and informal colonial dependencies, indigenous peasant revolts, the US stands implicated in its un-budging posture of global counterrevolution. The Philadelphia convention merely drives further nails into the coffin of humanity.

AUGUST 2, 2016

America and the Trump Conundrum

Joseph Sohm | Shutterstock.com

Trump is patently semi-fascist. His devouring ethnocentrism (American Greatness) and xenophobia (Anti-Immigrant, Anti-Muslim) confirms a structural-ideological process at work of social Nazification underpinned by his dedication to wealth and amorphous quest for power. In this respect he is the easy target of liberals and progressives, both Democrats as a whole and a moderate segment of Republicans, as well as the “responsible” media like The New York Times.

No argument there. If it were possible to stand alone, abstracting all circumstances and reality, the foregoing would hold, true in and of itself, without qualification. Yet I do not detract from this indictment of Trump, an absolute menace to democratic thought and practice, when I say it is only half the story. The other half is America itself, particularly those who portray him as a monster. They do not have clean hands, Obama and Clinton on down, including most of what we commonly think of as the Left.

Trump is America. I am not a social scientist, i.e., one who, as Barrington Moore pointed out, could carry societal propositions through to the fourth decimal place and certify their validity. I am frankly impressionistic here, but I estimate that between half and two-thirds of all Americans deep down think as Trump does—and the record of American history since World War II tends to confirm that. The leopard cannot change its spots, except at election time, when it behooves one side to appear more enlightened than the other, submerging gut (and thought out) positions to the smug declaration of liberalism and human rights.

Every position he has thus far announced, as so many nails in his political coffin and immediately pounced on for disclosure and condemnation, is actually what the vast majority of Americans believe. It is not simply that Trump is semi-fascist traveling the path to a fulsome actualization, but that America also is: ethnocentric, xenophobic, and worse, blood-thirsty in its pursuit of National Security and the triumphalism of monopoly capital. Anti-immigrant, anti-

Muslim, of course, though not admitted for public consumption. Deference to wealth and the wealthy—so what else is new? Patriotism as code for conformity to racial principles (to which blacks under Obama have submitted, surrendering any potential radicalism that would result in dignity and equality), hierarchical social structuring, and the all-pervasive poisons of militarism—ditto.

In other words, criticism of Trump is misleading and self-serving. No one really cares about his fascistic policy stands, his insults, his broad-based defamations of character, because they are ours as well, the Mighty Fortress of Purity nicknamed, Exceptionalism. What we care about are his references to Putin and Russia. There he goes too far. Every think-tank intellectual and defense “expert” is up-in-arms (literally) at this manifest betrayal of Cold War moral truths about America’s place in the world. If Trump had played it straight, as expected by both parties and the general electorate, Pentagon jargon at the ready, anticommunism in tow, Free World rhetoric freshly minted for the occasion, we would have a very different presidential contest.

Hypocrisy is running rampant (which he may or may not sense). Clinton is just as ideologically and politically rotten as he, rotten—a strong term I use unapologetically (it signifies putridity, moral corruption)—on both domestic and foreign policy. The Putin/Russian invocation is a convenience when we mean something else—a fear of exposure to the whole policy drift that America and its leadership have taken. If anything, Trump and Clinton are a step behind the nation’s fascist tendencies, which is why they have been thrust up to the political roles they now enjoy. Is Clinton any better than Trump on Wall Street, on privatization, on financial concentration, market penetration, corporate taxation, even recipient of business largesse and friendship? From Goldwater Girl to the present, she hasn’t changed an iota, if anything, under Bill’s example and tutelage, more extreme in supporting and benefiting from a militarized, brutal mode of capitalism than could have been foreseen at Wellesley.

But it is her foreign-policy baggage, an undeniable record, that marks her stride-for-stride with Trump, or in fact ahead of him in the high art of intervention, regime change, political murder—for what else is approval of armed drone targeted assassination, but that? Clinton, the Lincoln Great Emancipator of Children, is responsible for the murder of more children as Secretary of State and before and after, as in recommending the Afghan surge, and in her coziness with Flournoy and Panetta (destined for Cabinet posts if she should win) that beckons America to a war-footing posture of permanent war. Trump is grade-school material compared with Clinton in harnessing the War Establishment for purposes of military-ideological confrontation with both Russia and China, a simultaneous unilateral push for uncontested world dominance.

Conclusion: Not that Trump is Debs, Heywood, or Dr. King. He is as close to the incarnation of evil as they come. But so is Clinton. So is practically every liberal and progressive who for too long have kept their rancid antiradicalism beneath the surface as they have countenanced or actively supported domestic repression and foreign aggression. Criticizing Trump and not in equal measure and with equal conviction Clinton is to stand awash in false consciousness, making one complicit in the continued fascistization of America.

AUGUST 10, 2016

“U.S.A.” Chant: Hegemonic Unity in Global Domination

Hermann Goring Trump and Ilsa Koch Clinton make a charming couple. They are irascible in their protestations of Americanism, variant styles, and temperaments. Nevertheless, they converge in the commitment to patriotic militarism (aka, plebiscitary fascism cum monopoly capital) as the ideological vehicle to national greatness. Their common bond, beyond an inordinate capacity for undifferentiated resentment and hatred, is their capacity, as a function of major-party politics, to mobilize a like mass response at bottom xenophobic (in international politics, Russia, China) and ethnocentric (the dissident, radicals, peace advocates). For Trump, Muslims play the role that Jews did for Hitler; for Clinton, socialists and pacifists perform the same historical function. Working people including labor unions (hence the plebian dimension to fascism), contrary to history and Marxian wish-fulfillment, have become the shock troops thrusting forward both candidates on the political formula, war-readiness and, so far as class interests are concerned, self-castration.

Fascism has never been in finer fettle in America: who needs a guttural Joe McCarthy when the specimens at hand are ready and willing to lead? The conversation has barely changed. The irreducible anticommunism characterizing, by whatever name (now, terrorism, previously, radicalism, anarchism, socialism), the national discourse of insecurity and aggression, is readily converted into a cesspool of generalized phobias. These are supported at all points by concrete actions of US foreign policy, in which intervention and regime change have kept the rest of the world on tenterhooks.

So here we are, awaiting another presidential election, which, truth be told, merely adumbrates and delineates themes prevalent for seventy years, since the close of World War II. There have been few exceptions in leadership in either party to the Leadership Principle (the fusion of person, social structure, political economy), few policy orientations and platform measures to impede the course of impending fascist closure, few if any breakthroughs to the regimentation of social thought now typified in Obama's promotion of massive surveillance, few courageous, stand-up acts of resistance on the part of labor to war, concentrated wealth, the privileged status of Vested Interests, from banking to oil, to medicine, to pharmaceuticals—and the list creeps on to near-infinity.

Whither America? Democracy, beginning in the 17th century, has never been one of its strong suits. The Marxian dialectic is distinguished by its absence, a monochromatic progression of ever-expanding sameness. The city on the hill extends to the swamps of moral absolutism and indifference to humanity. Stepping back, one sees Trump-Clinton as the singular expression of contempt for the democratization of society, economy, and culture, a process coterminous with the valuing of authoritarian patterns in world affairs. Trump-Clinton is the voice of one when it comes to the articulation and projection of world power, the voice of increased stridency if that were possible when added to such power is the universality of capitalism as the sole legitimate global system.

Try as one might, daylight cannot be forced between them. Ruling groups are sacrosanct, the best citizenry, to be looked up to as the generators and custodians of the national wealth, with Trump-Clinton sharing duple captaincy. Wall Street and Corporate America in general could not be more delighted with these circumscribed political boundaries. Scratch the candidate, either one, and beneath exists the nether world of military power virtually unlimited in scope and size, anxiously waiting to spring forward. Whether autarky is conceived as nationalism (Trump) or internationalism (Clinton), its message of self-sufficiency as the militarization of exceptionalism is heard loud and clear.

What have America's major political parties become but agents of pacification, canceling out political change while the exercise of power is funneled into an elitist system of Upper Capital in which the military is welcomed with open arms. Trump vies with Clinton in extolling the virtues of strength and National Greatness, which boil down to self-accredited authority to define and regulate international politics to achieve, among other things, global ideological purification. It is as though imperialism, centered on market penetration, has given way to domination for its own sake. And complementing that, we find an arousal of anger to divert attention from the failings of capitalism, thereby disarming criticism and at the same time tightening the screws of a discrepant framework of wealth-and-income distribution.

Come November, Republicans, Democrats, Trump, Clinton, who cares? The political parties have charted the race to the bottom for so long, one more soft landing will hardly be noticed. In prideful affirmation, we term this the normalization of democratic practice. Fewer and fewer Americans, as time goes on, are seeing through the charade. In that light, fascism will meet with little resistance when its time comes, decked out in bunting, even confetti thrown from the rooftops.

AUGUST 25, 2016

Troglodyte Vs. Goebblean Fascism: The 2016 Presidential Race

Simply, we have “reclusive habits or outmoded or reactionary attitudes” (Webster’s) and sophisticated, propagandistic methods initially perfected in modern times by Nazi Germany (Pollack): Trump/Clinton, a race to the rock-bottom of authoritarianism, sans—for now—the concentration camp, but NOT, its foreign policy equivalent, a contest over who is more militaristic and war-like, directed into a confrontational posture in world politics.

Everything is secondary, whether immigration restriction or Wall-Street-favoritism of corporatism, to the ultimate threat to humankind in the visceral belligerence manifested by the two candidates, and the makeover of society to realize their respective visions (not that dissimilar) of unilateral domination of the Global System. Demagogy is not new to American politics; what is increasingly new is its distinctively fascist, as opposed to mere reactionary, cast of mind and projected operations.

Trump is perhaps an iconoclastic expression of what the vast majority of Americans have come to believe, and in that respect is not different from the liberal and conservative variants of the basic theme: a profound antiradicalism embodied in the integrated relationship between government and business (interpenetration of elites into a homogeneous ruling group where the State and Capitalism, with the addition of the Military, are fused into a functioning command system). The system is at once political, economic, and ideological, whose purpose is the tightening and perpetuation of an hierarchical social order composed of invidious class differences.

Fascism should not trip lightly off the tongue, for that trivializes its appearance when it comes. But it is here, or nearly so, with its hard side, an ethnocentric/xenophobic ideational core, and its soft side, the structural encroachment of business on every phase of American life, consumerism the mandate for imperialism and global conquest, the State supplying the planning and necessary hardware. This attitudinal-systemic framework is not the monopoly (pardon the pun) of one party, but represents the primordial impulse representing both—as though there were no alternatives, no turning back, a decadent future seemingly though not really deterministic, only made to appear so.

Scratch a liberal and you have antiradicalism. That is what liberalism has been about since at least the time of John Locke, not redistributive social justice but purging anything to the Left (as in the case of the English 17th century Levellers onward) which might challenge an ever more codified and rigidified capitalist weltanschauung ratified by today's American ideological value-oriented consensus. What is to be done? Talk of course is cheap, a self-castration awaiting further political-structural regimentation. Regrettably, I have no solution, at least none that will pass the smell test of massive surveillance already currently practiced. Landmarks are falling. The New York Times is virtually aligning itself with the Enemy by consecutively attacking Trump without a commensurate exposure of Clinton.

Each day the so-called rival camps outdo each other in nailing the coffin of democracy, itself lying on the ground alongside the pit being dug. That the Republicans nominated Trump in the first place, despite last-minute defections to a position not much better, confirms that party's moral bankruptcy. But how are the Democrats any different? Clinton, following Bill's example, has been so corrupt and self-serving for so long (with the Vested Interests piling up behind to share in the economic-financial-structural lucre), that the normalization of political criminality is no longer noticed. We have become habituated as a nation to an amoral cynicism justifying as the rightful fruition of exceptionalism a solipsistic obsession with power, gain, world mastery.

The latter words might not be found in either party's platform, but there is equal subscription to their values, Republicans starting from an internal Fortress America, the Democrats merely assuming that to offer a more articulated paradigm of global domination. In both cases, an increasing deformation of American society, starting with an assault on the social safety net, is required to initiate and realize a tightly-organized class society in the name of classlessness. The poor beware, minorities beware, dissenters beware, no authentic respect for human rights, even civility qua mutual politeness, can be expected, and will come to the vanishing point, when the integral purposes of mature capitalism are achieved.

Alienation is built into the societal edifice, a known factor long before Marx's Economic-Philosophical Manuscripts of 1844, which enabled him to write as presciently as he did. The commodity becomes engrained in the human psyche, and from there the merry race commences, codified in the institutions and culture of property, for superiority one over another fellow human being. Is it too late for systemic rectification of what should be regarded as the political culture of oppression and evil? That would make for an interesting starting point for discussion and possible action, not the mealy-mouthed platitudes offered by the candidates, their respective parties, and America as a whole.

AUGUST 26, 2016

American Exceptionalism: A Pernicious Doctrine

Ideology is the self-serving goad to and representation of power. It is an integral function of political domination. The political as the more familiar expression of statecraft and class rule, it provides the core of meaning for underlying other expressions of power and domination: economic, cultural, whatever is the means for asserting, developing, and stabilizing hegemonic purposes—preponderance, influence—over others, be they nations, classes, individuals. When exceptionalism is claimed and maintained, that is a sure-fire invocation of an antidemocratic mindset, structural framework, and political economy.

Exceptionalism is not a matter of moral virtue (it never is, or it would not be claimed), but of raw, unmitigated force, real, implied, or waiting in the wings. American exceptionalism is no exception; indeed, it is confirmatory, seldom have other nations advanced such claims. In recent history (we might go back to the Roman Empire and even further, to Sparta in Ancient Greece), the clearest most obvious example is Nazi Germany: the Third Reich of a Thousand Years. Hitlerian ideology depended on the theme of exceptionalism to manifest its superiority, which took in the murder of millions. Exceptionalism, as a claim on humanity, is inherently evil; it cannot subsist without accompaniment of militarism, genocide, internal manipulation and social control.

Exceptionalism is an open proclamation of superiority. It is no wonder it forms the inner heart of American ideology, a continuing motif since John Winthrop's "City on a Hill," although then stated in perhaps more innocent theological terms, summoning the 17th century vision of Commonwealth and the possibility of a society knit together around the principle of equity. Not so, later; for by the late 18th century, commonwealth, applied to America, had already lost its meaning, and the American Revolution merely restated the Lockean societal and propertied framework legitimating class and racial dependence on the—you guessed it—superior. From there to the mid- and latter-19th century ideology of Manifest Destiny was a hop, skip, and a jump, so well had the ground been prepared as corporate and industrial capitalism became ascendant forces.

In sum, exceptionalism, once more given pride of place, from rationales for intervention, to buttressing a flagging national spirit, is a defining trait of American political thought. Its influence is everywhere, as in the self-righteous vaporization of individuals in targeted drone assassination, in mounting and carrying to completion regime change, in demanding outsized rights to shape and benefit from the world financial system, in establishing the foundation for its own version of the unilateral Capitalist Millennium, and binding together these and related traits and policies, a nonpareil military strength to compel observance/obedience to American wishes, dictates, decisions, even whims.

Exceptionalism poses a grave danger to the world community. But why, in a seemingly abstract piece on US intellectual history, raise this concern now, and why focus on exceptionalism? The reason should be clear: both major-party candidates, and behind them, the political parties that they represent, behind them, the nation as a whole, and finally, the very substance of American ideology, have made of exceptionalism the motive force for and reason behind this country's existence—with all of the consequences that follow in its wake. Democracy is, and perhaps always has been, a sham, when superiority is claimed as part of its self-identity. America has issued itself a get-out-of-jail card from near its inception, certifying it can do no wrong. Today, Trump and Clinton speak as one on the maximization of America's global power. They speak as one on the existence of the drastic maldistribution of wealth. They speak as one on gargantuan expenditures for the US war machine. They speak as one on the denial of, and exemption from, war crimes committed in the past and continuing into the present, with no sign of a turnaround in the future. Iraq, Libya, Syria, marching back in time to Vietnam, as the incubator of merely the most recent round of hostile acts.

Exceptionalism, right at this moment, is more germane to the state of America's perpetual motion toward aggrandizement and legitimated violence than perhaps ever, because more out of keeping with the aspirations of humankind. Woodrow Wilson would make the world safe for democracy; Trump, Clinton, Obama, would cram it (more suitably defined to suit the national interest) down the throats, in the name of world order, of the global peoples. Trade, markets, investment, the nuts-and-bolts of imperialism, while still vitally important, take a backseat to the military imperatives of maintaining an overlordship of the international system—a goal consistent with the belief in exceptionalism.

The naked thirst for power, even if for no other reason than the morbid fear of falling behind other nations, may play well in Peoria, but it holds the potential for unimaginable destruction, as though Dulles's rollback theory and planning are again operant, not only vis-à-vis Russia and China, but a multipolar world of awakened energies. America resolutely faces what it considers the encirclement of strangers, aliens, darkened forces, whose sole purpose is to question and ultimately demolish the one incarnation of exceptionalism (because there can only be one) in world politics, the repository of enlightenment shined on by God's grace. No better formula for exploitation has yet been devised, with gradually increasing consequences at home as well as abroad.

SEPTEMBER 5, 2016

Hillary Clinton is Shameless

Never has a candidate for President been so solicitous—and transparent about it—of major wealth, what the New York Times (stepping out of character) admits is her appeal to the Ultrarich. In Chozick and Martin's, "Where Has Hillary Clinton Been? Ask the Ultrarich," Sept. 3, we find the most lopsided appeal to wealth—at the expense of normal campaigning—in US electoral history: estate after estate, party after party, closed doors, the pampered and selfish, coming out of the woodwork, to bask in the love of one who gravitates to them like moths to a light.

Hillary Clinton has no shame. Forget press conferences. Brazen out FBI findings of duplicity, criminality (though the Agency demurs from the charge), inadvertence in destroying evidence, a bottomless well of rotten practice—and this the darling of liberals and so-called progressives. Weighed in the scales of decency and social justice, how is she better than Donald Trump? Both are fascistically-inclined, both have contempt for working people and minorities, both have chauvinistic militarism in their blood. How can there be a choice of the lesser of two evils when each vies for the pinnacle of Evil-ness?

Whore? For $125,000, you get dinner and a meet-the-candidate (some as high as a quarter $M)—and if under 16 years old at the gathering, for $10,000 you can ask the candidate a question. Auction-block politics, except that it is the American people on the slave-block. In this hothouse atmosphere, the host ensures Clinton will not be embarrassed. Why should she be, they're all bosom buddies, all see eye-to-eye, gatherings of the self-righteous that make a Mafia summit look like a children's tea party.

What is to be done? Trump is hardly an alternative. The plebeian billionaire is capable of anything. Clinton has disqualified and perjured herself as unworthy of any office. She and her husband, the Bonnie & Clyde of Mammon worship (even Trump, hard to believe, seems to have more character). As for the decisive area of foreign policy, there is little to choose: the sophistication of liberal think-take, national-security genocidal adventurism on one hand, gut-authoritarians, simple-minded zealots on the other. Of the two, the former may well be the more dangerous.

Is the Third Party a valid alternative? To many, yes, but here we still do not have a clean break from the Cold War mentality. (And Bernie Sanders wins a medal as outstanding disappointment with his ersatz Revolution funneled into the Clinton camp.) America is a declining Empire, desperately grasping for straws. Anything to stand on top, its strategic focus on counterrevolution, its political focus on structural-ideological hierarchy to keep the poor at bay and in their place. At some point, the malaise of fascist boredom will possibly solve our problems for us, with the mushroom cloud. There is nothing to indicate a spirit of freedom in the works, except possibly on cultural issues which—everything else the same—do not and cannot translate into authentic democratic feeling.

I may overstate the gloom-and-doom scenario, in which case CounterPunchers might find incentive in promoting fruitful ways of radicalizing America. Thinking small will not do it, whether the commune or political capture of a single town. Power has been centralized at the bayonet-point of perfection, easily able to absorb when not crushing societal dissidence. But the very least one can ask of any human being is not to support either major-party candidate. Militarism is in the air—the stench, overpowering. Ditto, plutocracy. The two go together, and any alternative must tackle them both, shrink and ultimately destroy the cancer metastasizing in the American body politic.

SEPTEMBER 8, 2016

The American Way: Indefinite Detention

Recent reports state that President Obama upon leaving the White House will have a multimillion dollar mansion in Washington. I delight in his good fortune. It is only appropriate that one who has devoted his presidency to serving the wealthy (and the military, for such assistance is ideologically conjoined) should live closely to, and in the manner keeping with, his clientage. In that way, he can summon, or be summoned (less likely), on the spot.

Of course a nine-bedroom residence and presumably a private jet, his own or at his disposal, costs money. But all of us concerned for his welfare are relieved to know that household and other expenses will be at least partially met by the proposed signing agreement promised to be in the neighborhood of $25M for three books (and his wife, Michelle, for her memoirs, an additional $10M).

This is as it should be. Devotion to plutocracy and militarism, in a society which prioritizes them next to God in importance, and as revelatory of the Nation's spirit, has rightfully earned such rewards from a grateful public. Staring down Russia and China stiffens our people's spinal column, makes each and every person (absent illegals) proud of a heritage of anticommunism, keepers of the faith of international capitalism, on which we dwell and daily praise.

Obama, the quintessential warmonger (cum Nobel laureate), is an engrossing study in power, articulating perfectly the ethos of capitalist striving, so that the personal factor—his own—has a role in both modes of activity: a sure-footed entitlement to lead, according to one's lights, and an equally certain entitlement to pecuniary success. To command, and receive worshipful gratitude in return (Leader of the Free World), is matched, as if making up for prior deprivation, by a positive lust for wealth, status, position—never enough, once tasted. Obama's solicitous regard for those enjoying wealth and power is come by honestly, the twin pursuit inscribed in his experience and personality.

Also come by honestly (though twisted out of shape) is his despisement of softness, weakness, which is to be equated with democracy, transparent government, civil liberties, all of which he violates at every opportunity to prove his Americanism and his own moral character. Among his testaments to worthiness as a national leader is his practice, through Executive action, of targeted drone assassination. Mindful of his solemn obligation to keeping the American people safe, he clearly values his title of Commander-in-Chief as much as he does POTUS. Together that gives him unquestioned license to expand Executive Authority, carrying into such areas as massive surveillance of the people, employment of the Espionage Act to ferret out dissent, and assemble a Cabinet fully subscribing to his geopolitical aims of disproportionate world influence in a framework of unilateral military-commercial-financial-ideological dominance.

One proud achievement, symbolizing the whole, is the retention of Guantanamo, validating the principle of indefinite detention. Again, solicitous of Americans' well-being, not wanting to harm moral sensibilities, Guantanamo, for him, is a shining example of conducting torture with impunity, out of the limelight so that no-one is disturbed at home. This is part of a larger grasp of what constitutes ethical policy making, embodied in humanitarian interventionism and regime change, which rescues victims of Left oppression and repression. Guantanamo, then, is code for the genius of American freedom: an outpost for instructing the heathen in the ways of true democracy (unadorned capitalism, without such frills as rule of law, equitable distribution of wealth and power, respect for human dignity in all its forms).

If I may be so bold, Mr. President, I respectfully urge you, before occupying your Washington mansion, to spend a year, upon leaving office, in a Guantanamo jail cell. The stay should prove exhilarating, a sojourn into the mental landscape of true Americanism, where after your noble service you have earned the right to view the fruits of your labors. Then, returning home to Washington, you will feel inspired to offer guidance on how best to keep the military and intelligence communities on their toes. Private instruction in the arts of waterboarding and electric-shock treatment will keep you up to speed on current events and the ability to carry on a proper discourse with colleagues in government, think tanks, and academia. A grateful nation is at your feet, profiting from your knowledge of and thirst for hegemony, and should the need be, a resort to nuclear war.

SEPTEMBER 14, 2016

Fascism Trumps Democracy: America, A State of Impunity

Notwithstanding my title's oblique reference to Trump, he is not the greater of the dangers now facing America, but an entirely known factor, representing a gut incipient fascism grounded primarily in capital accumulation, a nymphomaniac drive for ownership, deal-making, undisguised prestige—in short, the very traits becoming to American's wish for wealth, power, and status on which its system of capitalism is based. Ethnocentrism gives it a psychological heart, sheer ignorance of humane sensibility, a soul, indifference to the humiliation and destruction of others because of capitalism's workings, a modal personality and societal mental set. We've had many examples of The Donald up-and-down the line, from the 10%, 5%, 1%, down to the bottom of the social-class scale, that being how effective false consciousness has been disseminated downward through the American value system. He presently vibrates with what appears to be a significant portion of the working class. So be it; at least the portents and record are there for fighting back.

Not so the Obamas and Clintons in our midst, largely free from serious criticism by a supine, homogenized radicalism, chanting the “lesser-of-two-evils” song on the way, not to the gas chambers (not even Trump has, as yet, gone this far), but a manifestation and structure of liberal fascism, possibly more militaristic, more ensconced deeply in a Cold War mental set, talking a good game on immigration while actively promoting a class-state of monopolism equal to anything Trump favors. We have then a condition of growing fascistization with little internal checks and differentiate primarily by rhetorical flourishes. Obama is the point man, exceeding his predecessors, in global counterrevolution, intervention, regime change, and the steady pressures toward confrontation with, above all, China, but also Russia. Meanwhile, Clinton fits the bill, perhaps more viscerally combative, with Russia, rather than China, the chief ADVERSARY. (Caps. are necessary, because the US cannot exist, much less thrive, without an enemy, whether for the mammoth defense industry, an hegemonic foreign policy, or the social discipline at home, to keep the internal market going, ferret out dissent on policy, favor the already enriched and favored.)

Stealth destroyers, appropriation $4B+, already noticed in today's Times; the safety net grows more outmoded, environmental degradation and pollution continue apace, the murder rate in Chicago and other major cities climbs, but imperialism is, literally, business-as-usual. And business itself is business as usual: Bank of America last week's poster boy of questionable behavior. "You break it, you own it" might be the slogan in a small business souvenir shop, but what of the bigger picture? American business, notably, railroads and banking, by the mid-19th century, had already broken the promise of democracy, and fixing the system on democratic lines has grown more remote with time. That is where "fascism" is not an expletive, but reality: the interpenetration of business and government, capitalism and the State, the cozy amalgam of wealth, power, the military, which even the strongest chisel could not pry them apart.

Germany had its form, Italy, its, Japan, its, all signifying cultural and linguistic differences, but not systemic ones, capitalism in each case, and the social structure of hierarchy it created, the determinative factor in shaping the polity and its purposes of Order, deservedly the dirtiest word in the political lexicon. Everyone knows his/her place in a fascist social order. Substantive protest is muted, whether through repression or indoctrination. America now joins the 20th century's historical Big Three of fascist persuasion, relying more on indoctrination than explicit, overt repression. Fly-over military jets at football games is the Pavlovian reminder of requisite patriotism to be considered, and consider oneself, the Good American. (Trump merely echoes the man-in-the-street, his difference being a silk shirt for a denim work shirt.) But it is Clinton who deserves, and has earned the respect, of all right-thinking Americans, parroting the vitriol of the defense intellectuals, propaganda masters (even Axelrod in today's paper seems to have become critical), her controlled shrillness, backed by her husband's man-of-destiny complex, posing more serious risks for putting nails into the coffin of democracy.

Why choose either, Trump or Clinton? Elections are rigged, not by corruption, but, more profoundly, by the political culture and class structure of the society, the candidates merely the façade for several centuries of political-economic-ideological development, cumulative, self-renewing, above all, hubristic, i.e., exaggerated pride, the Chosen, backed by the military force to cram it down the throats of all and sundry, where "friends and allies" become, for these purposes of unilateral global dominance, indistinguishable from adversaries and enemies in successfully maintaining claims of leadership and greatness.

SEPTEMBER 16, 2016

Obama-Clinton: Siamese Twins of Reaction

Language is corruptive, giving legitimacy to present-day power relations, screening out critical meaning and analysis as fortifying existing power. Thus, liberalism, already in the 18th century code for a propertied-society valuing exclusive appropriation of wealth is stretched in 21st century America into a Cold War mental set that sanctions capitalism down the line, its militaristic underpinnings of survival and growth, and the commodification of the individual, socially regimented to represent the integration of patriotism and consumerism. From the standpoint of human freedom, there is little to choose between it and its supposed antithesis, conservatism. Both, as practiced in the US, lead to alienation and war, one needful of the other to stomach the national aspiration of global hegemony.

What brings on this seeming tirade? Simply, the hollowness and moral emptiness of the present Administration, which, by default, allows its presumed opposite to have credence, gain support, and participate, as a joint-partner, in the stimulation of false consciousness leading to an unqualified acceptance of capitalism in its true complexion as the systemic historical vehicle for inequality, expansion, aggression, reproducing within the society the features projected onto the world: a regimentation of sameness in thought and practice, an ideology of greed and selfishness interlaced with mistrust of Others, a compulsion to barbaric acts when viewed as the advancement of self-interest.

Obama's recent seeming concessions to environmentalism, as though cleansing his bloody hands of armed drone targeted assassination, is a case in point: policy is unitary, setting aside national monuments not offsetting the nuclear modernization of America's destructive force, its engagement in regime change, its mounting of global paramilitary and related operations, its drive—despite reports of national income gains—to increase/intensify wealth-differentiation, and with it, the basis of status, power, and ideological acceptance, all leaving not-so-pristine forests and lakes and atmosphere, sullied by the stench of war crimes, domestic hardship, a people of bitterness disguised as superiority.

But why single out liberals (for our purposes here, Democrats) when a presumed greater menace lies on the horizon, or rather, is conspicuously present: Trump and Republicans? I revert to the 1940s, a more straight-talking time, when words had their designated meaning. Confronted with The Donald, we would have characterized him as a political douchebag, dumb in all things save wealth acquisition, and on that score, beneath contempt for chasing the dollar as a private God, warmed-over fakery his stock-in-trade, altogether detestable were the society not already in conformity with his self-image. But it is, or is becoming so; and here we see the convergence of the Obama-Clinton and Trump syndromes, slightly alternative paths to the same destination: contemptuous of all that does not serve wealth and wealth-making.

The world's people are so many inanimate integers to be plotted, victimized, abandoned when it suits, herded into settings and situations where profits can be extracted from them, looked down on and condemned so that they become habituated to subordination, a procession fed into the maw of capitalism. Could Putin and Xi possibly be any worse, either to their own people or the larger world? In fact, Putin and Xi are vital to American interests, inducing a patriotic response to any who might dissent from America's hegemonic claims. Invoke the devil, to silence the worthy. Democrats and Republicans alike are skilled practitioners in red-baiting, and with rare exceptions, like the New Deal, always have been (with Wilsonian liberalism leading the charge in modern times). This is to say, Obama-Clinton, by articulating so well and so subtly the Right, legitimate Trump, who might, given substantive alternatives, stand out instead as the Clown Prince of Native Fascism. He doesn't, because they, too, are playing on the same court, giving him ample wiggle-room to score at will.

Obama-Clinton extends the range of Reactionary politics, society, and governance, and makes them respectable, Trump merely polishing the rough edges. We await the verdict, not with trepidation, however, but with disgust. Anyone who can see light between the two candidates is a better observer than I—and parenthetically, I still want, for the sake of consistency and conscience, to see more done with foreign policy from the third parties. This is no time to be single-factored in agitation and presentation of an agenda. If policy is unitary, for all sides, issues are interrelated. One cannot speak on behalf of the environment, and simultaneously fail to make distinctions on the international scene. I realize this is unpopular to say, but Putin is not Obama-Clinton, and does not merit the demonization presently accorded him to make the American Left appear more patriotic.

And even if he were equally reprehensible (a good 1940s word, like douchebag), America has its own problems to straighten out and rectify.

SEPTEMBER 20, 2016

Obama Plays the Race Card: Vile Politics on Demand

Obama takes personally black millennials' lukewarm support of Clinton, as though a mark of disrespect, disloyalty, lack of gratitude, unconcern about his own legacy—when he has done so much to advance the cause of black rights (even symbolically, his presence as POTUS). But what is his legacy? And why should blacks celebrate his tenure, much less esteem him as a person?

Obama's legacy begins with armed drones for targeted assassination, a hands-on President, meeting with likeminded national security advisers off the Situation Room on Terror Tuesdays to identify, authorize, and give the plan to execute political murder, a present-day example of lynching from 8,000 miles away. No president in US history has so involved himself in the details of executing others. And no president has been so flippant in shrugging off the results of "collateral damage" (as witness this past week in Syria).

Washington has become a center of ghoulishness under his watch. Can blacks or anyone else with conscience shrug off the consequences of such immoral acts, particularly, for blacks, the insult of being invited to be complicit in the ways of evil? If Dr. King were alive, would he urge support for Obama, and now, Obama's effort to elect Clinton? Would Clinton, devoted to war, war preparation, hawkish in every fiber of her immoral being, even be the Democratic nominee, if Obama had not already had two terms in the presidency, despoiling, perhaps permanently, a party that once gave us FDR, Henry Wallace, Adlai Stevenson, George McGovern, fair, decent individuals sincere about the cause of peace?

Obama's legacy does not stop with assassination, but spreads in geometric proportion to intervention, regime change, paramilitary operations, a basketful of militarism capped by, first, confrontation with Russia (egging NATO on to the Russian borders), and now more decisively, confrontation with China, via battleships, carrier groups, B52 flyovers, joint military maneuvers in adjacent areas, all for the purpose of encirclement, isolation, containment, perhaps—in Obama's further embellishment of his legacy—rollback (to Third World dependence) à la John Foster Dulles.

Obama and Clinton are indistinguishable when it comes to belligerence, nuclear-arsenal modernization, deregulation, sympathy for Wall Street, chicanery, egomania, stealth and fear of transparency, hardly suited for a society that professes belief in democracy. If Obama has the likes of John Brennan in his entourage, Clinton has her husband, and the Family Foundation doing the dirty work of American foreign policy via the avenue of personal enrichment. Does all of this in any way force one into the arms of Trump? No, nonsense, not likely. It merely reveals the moral bankruptcy of today's American political leadership.

Trump is a dangerous charlatan, Obama and Clinton occupying the same ideological ground with slightly more sophistication and political savvy. Would you buy a used car from any of the three? Would you entrust world peace or the life and well-being of your child or grandchild to any of the three? Perhaps the remedy, such as it is, is to boycott the polls, march on election day to show your contempt for such villainy, stand in earth-shattering silence, in places of public visibility (as we did in civil rights and antiwar protests years ago—when there was a better America), displaying contempt for the ruthlessness and deviousness of our so-called leaders. Their skins are thick. They won't change their behavior and values, or even recognize the disapproval being expressed. Of course not, because they are empty souls used to self-promotion as a way of life, over the bodies of those they victimize.

Fifty-or-so days left: more crocodile tears lamenting lack of affection and loyalty, as meanwhile Obama, Clinton, Trump, the Three Musketeers of American fascism, plan new ways of inveigling themselves, their schemes, their thirst for aggrandizement, into the hearts of the American public.

SEPTEMBER 23, 2016

Sovereign Immunity, War Crimes, and Compensation to 9/11 Families

Sovereign immunity is a doctrine in international law which exempts nations from responsibility for their aggressive actions. It sanctions war crimes under the fiction that governments are not behind the doings of their citizens—and by implication, government itself. Thus, e.g., the My Lai Massacre could not be charged against the United States Government (USG), but only individuals like Lt. Calley. There is no recourse for the families of murdered victims against the country responsible, say, for armed drone targeted assassination, intervention, regime change, paramilitary operations, saturation bombing, waterboarding, etc. International law, especially on sovereign immunity, is written by the strong, the conqueror, the hegemonic, not the preyed on or the product of abstract moral reasoning.

Power becomes its own morality. One can see from the foregoing that the US would be skittish, not to say downright fearful, about overturning the principle of sovereign immunity. I am hardly the first to suggest that America is the leading purveyor of violence in the world today. It is not surprising that the US passed legislation in 1976 (although no-one speaks of it, American-commissioned atrocities in Vietnam may have had something to do with it) which provided exemption—on grounds of sovereign immunity—from legal suits for nations faced with legal actions for crimes committed in America. The principle had to be nailed down, if reciprocal privileges of immunity from lawsuits for American crimes abroad were to be respected. Again, international law, the big tent for hiding crimes instead of protecting the innocent.

But then we have 9/11, perhaps the most emotional-political-ideological symbol influencing US policymaking in recent times. Compensation must be provided the families of the victims, the 1976 legislation notwithstanding. Accordingly, Congress, beginning in last May, sought to alter the existing law, and did so by lopsided majorities—from the standpoint of national patriotism a no-brainer. Except for one thing: the 1976 legislation, now abrogated, had been seen as the ultimate barrier to punishment for American war crimes, and messing with the new legislation (i.e. a presidential veto) would leave the USG vulnerable to legal action.

Obama earlier promised to veto the legislation after it had passed both houses of Congress, a promise to be carried out tomorrow (September 23). At first sight, this is mind-boggling, the Supreme American Patriot placing himself in opposition to the 9/11 families. What goes on? Seemingly the Master of Expediency is losing his marbles. Not quite, and rather, a new page in Obama's villainy is opened. He will not give the real reasons for his decision to veto the Justice Against Sponsors of Terrorism Act, pleading instead vague national security considerations, opening America to frivolous suits when we are merely acting in the nation's interest, also, unnecessarily antagonizing a valued ally, Saudi Arabia, which has repeatedly denied all involvement in 9/11.

Here the Administration to make its case has just released (Tuesday) a letter to Congress—actually issued by the Saudis—claiming the high moral ground for sovereign immunity: “The safety and security of our diplomats, intelligence officers, military and other senior officials of the U.S. government, and their ability to perform their duties without foreign influence or intervention, would be seriously imperiled by a process intent on denying them the international immunities that have been accepted by all civilized nations since the 16th century and earlier.”

I liked that last little flourish/claim. It only gets better, the letter having been signed by William Cohen, Michael Mukasey, Steven Hadley, and Richard Clarke, hardly your American Friends Service Committee members seeking world peace. Nary a word in explanation (nor would any be forthcoming) on the main purpose of the veto—the secondary one being closeness to Saudi Arabia, as witness the Senate on Wednesday beating back the attempt to prevent Obama's $1.5B arms sale to the Saudis. What have we then? White House lawyers obliquely give the answer when they say that the Act compromises the principle of sovereign immunity, which, central to international law, as I noted, immunizes state actors from legal prosecution for their acts.

Cutting to the chase, I submit Obama risks public opprobrium because he wants to save the United States from liability for the commission of war crimes. Compensation can be arranged some other way, if at all. But continued targeted assassination, more and further dangerous confrontation with Russia and China, counterrevolution, in sum, the whole American posture vis-à-vis the World Community, would be jeopardized by the Justice Against Sponsors of Terrorism Act. It had to be vetoed, if America was to be free to continue on its path of unilateral global hegemony. That it is already being thwarted by the rise and reality of a multipolar structure of power only gives added encouragement to toughen it out on the question of war crimes and sovereign immunity.

SEPTEMBER 27, 2016

The Great Debate: Proto-Fascism vs. the Real Thing

From the subtitle, it is hard to know which is which; perhaps it would be better to say, “Equal Voices of Fascism,” so as not to indicate a preference for this race to the ideological bottom. Clinton and Trump equally menace human freedom, one through war, confrontation, and as the benefactor of wealth, the other, militarism and wealth itself. Together they favor power vested in upper groups in a framework of Total Order. Perhaps their sole difference lies in the paradigm each offers of the long-term development of monopoly capitalism, a question of means, not the end-result of the financialization and militarization of the System itself: i.e., varieties in the form of fascism.

Stated differently, the outcome rests on the internal pacification of working people in America (as well as global unilateral hegemony, in aspiration if no-longer-possible fact), turning on whether or not repression is central to social control. The best that can be said for Clinton is that the concentration camp/gas chamber syndrome is structurally and historically avoidable because her confidence in advanced capitalism and its ruling parties—chiefly, banking, industry, business, the military—can do the work of co-optation and absorption of the working class, obviating the need for overt force. I would term this, liberal fascism or the fascistization of liberalism. Neither one is oxymoronic, given liberalism’s ideological sanctioning of wealth accumulation and penchant for war and expansion—the foregoing ingrained in what C.B. Macpherson called, “possessive individualism”—only that, as now, liberalism in America fuses Capitalism, the State, and Militarism.

Thus, Clinton, for the present, need not go the path familiar to fascism in its Nazification mode. Her sympathy for, dedication to, and confidence in, capitalistic upper groups suffices to keep repression normalized through garden-variety indoctrination of consumerism and heightened patriotism, appealing to working people and minorities as their friend, indeed, champion, and counselor, while Trump is portrayed as an unreliable, gauche, Neanderthal-like figure (not necessarily off-base) who is essentially winging-it into a nebulous future. Wrong. Trump is Clinton stripped of liberal sophistication, i.e., a more truthful version of Clinton because he does not hide his attachment to war, confrontation (but see below the Putin-corrective to his arsenal of policy), ethnocentrism, xenophobia, and personal contempt for what each views as softness and weakness whenever America does not maximize its muscle-power.

Clinton is unintelligible without Goldman Sachs, as symbol and actuality of her deepest convictions, a camp follower of wealth-power-status dating back at least to her Goldwater-girl days, traversing a course of war-hawk proclivities and demeanor that in prideful assertion has never let up. (The Clintons have been notoriously bold in their enjoyment of both their close association with, and the largesse dispensed by, Goldman to their personal and so-called philanthropic coffers.) Precisely the Democratic contribution to that perpetual-Cold-War atmosphere is what makes a Trump legitimate and respectable. There are no longer any boundaries to America’s chiliastic quest for permanent greatness and dominance, particularly when liberalism underwrites the worst nightmares—from a democratic standpoint—of conservatism and reaction. Trump gets away with what he does, politically, ideologically, financially, because he goes several baby-steps beyond Clinton in the same policy-and-personal direction.

Trump, like Clinton, is no angel. If one represents a temporary respite from the degree of harsh punitiveness of overt fascism, the other is capable, in his idea of deportation of undocumented immigrants, of tapping the wellsprings of utter hostility (and the consequent punishment) of whomever he fears, contemns, or, push comes to shove, merely disfavors. Law is a plaything to both candidates, each one exhibiting the potential for unleashing violence at home or abroad. Trump, however, less sophisticated than Clinton, cannot trust as fully the assimilative powers of American ideology and its habituation of the populace to unrestrained capitalism (even though he has been a chief beneficiary of those powers) which derive from the political-cultural means of inducing the pacification of all those below the upper-middle or lower-upper class. For him, America is a bastion of wealth to those who are privileged, otherwise a wasteland to those undeserving. Clinton, by her actions, despite her rhetoric, might draw the line of stratification only slightly lower. We are left, then, with one who may elect more forceful means of social control more quickly (treatment of immigrants setting the precedent), but for either one Wealth and Power are in the driver’s seat.

In preparation for the debate, the New York Times jumped the gun yesterday with an editorial endorsing Clinton, “Hillary Clinton for President,” (Sept. 25), unintentionally revealing, by its near-categorical acceptance of her record and position, its own (similar) moral bankruptcy. It is worth noting its themes of acceptance, which includes, recognizing a fellow spirit in Clinton, a reactivated Cold War (it never really ended!) promoting conflict and confrontation with Russia and China, American exclusive global hegemony, and the adoption of realism (i.e., unilateral self-interest in foreign policy, an obliging working class, in domestic) in conducting policy.

Here are some highlights from the editorial. The Times praises her at the outset because, when becoming senator from New York, and assigned to Senate Armed Services, her work “earned the respect of Republicans like Senator John McCain with her determination to master intricate military matters.” (A peacenik, she’s not.) Among “[h]er most lasting achievements” was “an expansion of military benefits to cover reservists and the National Guard,” while apparently she can do no wrong even when she does wrong: “Her vote in favor of the Iraq war is a black mark, but to her credit, she has explained her thinking rather than trying to rewrite that history.” The same free pass as Secretary of State (pulling chestnuts out of the fire): “She bears a share of the responsibility for the Obama administration’s foreign-policy failings in Libya [NYT does not explain what those failings are]. But her achievements are substantial.” Not mentioned, e.g., is Clinton’s call for a greater number of troops in the Afghan surge than the Pentagon requested.

On foreign policy, the Times is positively vacuous, or worse, misleading. TPP is seen only in terms of trade, not a geopolitical framework to contain and isolate China, while the loaded term “reset” jumps from the page with respect to Russia: “She helped promote the Trans-Pacific Partnership, an important trade counterweight to China and a key component of the Obama administration’s pivot to Asia.... Mrs. Clinton’s attempt to reset relations with Russia, though far from successful, was a sensible effort to improve interactions with a rivalrous nuclear power.” And what might they be? Again, silence from the paper, as in the US using NATO to march up to the Russian border (similar to America’s own movements in the South China Sea and encouraging Japan’s nuclear development).

But perhaps my favorite sentence from the editorial, combining hegemony and presumed do-goodism, is this: “Mrs. Clinton has shown herself to be a realist who believes America cannot simply withdraw behind oceans and walls, but must engage confidently in the world to protect its interests and be true to its values, which include helping others escape poverty and oppression.” True, “She has evinced a lamentable penchant for secrecy and made a poor decision to rely on a private email server while at the State Department. That decision deserved scrutiny, and it’s had it.” (my italics) That’s as far as the Times goes in criticism—nowhere: “Now, considered alongside the real challenges that will occupy the next president, that email server...looks like a matter for the help desk.” The editorial’s closing words are inspiring: “Through war and recession, Americans born since 9/11 have had to grow up fast, and they deserve a grown-up president. A lifetime’s commitment to solving problems in the real world qualifies Hillary Clinton for the job, and the country should put her to work.” A sad performance on the part of a newspaper which prides itself on the motto, “All the News That’s Fit to Print,” and suppresses from half to two thirds of the story, particularly her closeness to business, finance, and the military.

Today the Times in a companion editorial lowered the boom on Trump, “Why Donald Trump Should Not Be President,” (Sept. 26), unexceptionable in its criticism, except (a) it steers away from the more serious point about his proto-fascist leanings, and (b) also evades a comparative evaluation of Clinton, which on both domestic- and foreign-policy grounds equally matches up. Militarism and plutocracy are no strangers to both. The Times comes down extremely hard on Trump for what one takes to be the obvious (in the subtitle calling him “a man who dwells in bigotry, bluster and false promises”), like shooting a bevy of quail with a high-powered rifle in a small bathtub. His “views were matters of dangerous impulse and cynical pandering rather than thoughtful politics.” So what else is new?

Trump is “feisty,” and “a man far more consumed with himself than with the nation’s well-being.” Correctly, the paper questions his business dealings, tax dodging, “self-dealing,” lack of “experience in foreign policy,” use of “anti-immigrant, nativist and racist signals...to build his base,” and avoidance of reporters’ questions. (When was the last time Clinton held a news conference?) But what most angers the Times about Trump’s candidacy is his foreign policy, notably, his doubts about NATO and expression “of admiration for the Russian president”: “Voters should consider what sort of deals Mr. Putin might obtain if Mr. Trump, his admirer, wins the White House.” (Red-baiting has not gone out of style.) The editorial concludes, “Our presidents are role models for generations of our children. Is this the example we want for them?” I would pose the same question of Clinton, and my answer would be the same, a resounding “No.”

Later. The debate is over. Claims of victory are already in the air. Talking heads are unloading their wisdom, with some desperation searching for the penetrating insight, foci of attention, a hidden meaning—and, for me, a near-absolute blank. The debate proved to be a non-event, the avoidance of substance in favor of one-upmanship over vaguely drawn questions. Nothing was said that contradicted, or modified, what is set forth above: a common essential posture of reaction which failed, despite sweet talk directed to minorities, formulas of economic growth, and professions of national greatness and strength, to move the goal posts away from incipient fascism. Here a verbatim transcript would not help; neither Clinton nor Trump transcended the mold of patriotic stasis to strike out boldly in a new direction. Both candidates peddled their customary wares, one denouncing Russia, the other China; one praising the American spirit, the other bemoaning the flight of manufacturing; each one probing vulnerable areas in the other’s personal character; no-one of the two providing offsets to and criticisms of the fundamentals of US foreign policy.

Does it matter who “won” or “lost,” when it is the country that is on a collision course with history? The basic profile of both domestic and foreign policy remained unchanged, which means drastically skewed income distribution at home, intervention and regime change abroad. Smugness of one was met by arrogance of the other. Whether NATO or autarky, respectively, was favored, it doesn’t matter, because hegemony remained the Holy Grail. In that regard, the differences on public policy, if believed, were never brought out, and probably were not meant to be. I confess, on one hand, to be dispirited, and on the other, not to have expected more. Perhaps one needs to revise one’s definition of fascism, to accord more room to bread-and-circuses as the means of instilling a faith in “democracy” in the public, when in fact business tyranny rules the roost and militarism becomes the latest flavor of false consciousness. My Comments to the New York Times, the first, on the editorial, “Hillary Clinton for President,” (Sept. 25), and the second, the editorial, “Why Donald Trump Should Not Be President,” (Sept. 26), follow:

I "...a matter for the help desk." The whole editorial is an apologia for a ruthless, careerist, not terribly bright individual with a strong penchant for grazing the truth. It could have been written by one of her advisers or her press secretary.

Because Trump is so bad does not warrant approval of Clinton, the latter currently the best the Democratic party can do, and hardly of the moral character and political wisdom of, say, Adlai Stevenson. It is indicative of the editorial's undue partiality and social myopia that not a word is found on Clinton's relations to Wall Street, defense contractors, pharmaceutical giants, nor, except in vague passing, her credentials as a war hawk supreme.

Perhaps the blind spot can be explained by The Times's own preferences in policy: corporate and banking favoritism, intervention, regime change, paramilitary operations. The paper has aligned itself with a party hardly deserving commendation, whether on democracy or human rights. In contrast, speaking truth to power would require condemnation of both candidates, not in the service of a third party, but as upholding the principle of non-complicity with evil and mediocrity.

But no, the paper does not understand that "realism," used to describe Clinton, can be an accommodation with vileness in the long term, when shortcuts are made. The paper reveals its true colors by its ideological-political shallowness, its want of authentic realism.

II "Is this the example we want for them?" No, clearly. Yet when one pairs this editorial with that on Clinton, one finds that dumping on Trump, however merited, is not matched by well-placed criticism of Clinton's record and character. By the latter I mean unstoppable ambition, fierceness on military policy, regime change, and support of Wall Street. In fact, the two candidates are hardly distinguishable—both flawed, neither one to be trusted on matters of state.

Why give credence even to a "lesser-of-two-evils" argument, when evil is a bipartisan affliction? This does not mean, necessarily, go out and support a third party. It means, speak truth to power and condemn the proceedings as a denial of human rights and democratic government. An honest position would be to recognize that America is no longer a just polity, and instead, a class-state tipping toward fascism. Of the two candidates and their supporting parties, both favor wealth concentration, and neither accepts basic principles of international law.

The Times would serve the nation better by admitting the dangers ahead, from a renewed, intensified Cold War to sharpening divisions in domestic wealth and power. Detraction from Trump is ever so easy, a thoroughly reprehensible figure, but why go from the frying pan into the fire by accepting, or even accommodating to, one as opportunist as Clinton? Thinking back to FDR and the New Deal, one's heart aches for what awaits America, from belligerence to mediocrity.

SEPTEMBER 30, 2016

The "Self-Hating" Jew: A Critique

The test of Judaism is to be an uncompromising supporter of Israel. I reject that. Shimon Peres's death brought out an avalanche of encomiums. To raise one word of criticism, his early stand on the settlements, his atrocities in Lebanon, his failure, supposedly changing his overall position, then to confront head-on, Israeli militarism, brings on one a tirade of abuse. There must be unanimity, particularly among Jews, like myself, or else subject to the charge of traitorous conduct if not worse. Today, in response to NYT's Roger Cohen article, "Peres and the Passing of Hope," I wrote a Comment (see below) and was denounced by a reader as a "ghetto Jew," one hiding behind walls of fear, and not granting Israel's supreme goodness and democracy.

No, not a ghetto Jew who has slunk away from slights and an inferiority complex, but fiercely proud of being Jewish, contesting all my life against anti-Semitism, but with several provisions: that to be Jewish carries with it, historically, the special responsibility to lock arms with all who have been persecuted and the victims of social injustice. Symbolically, I turn to Paul Robeson, Pete Seeger (see my CP obit., Jan. 2014), Dr. King, Eugene Debs, the proudly standing humanists and members of the Left, including, particularly in the trenches, like Schwerner and Goodman, along with Cheney, not Netanyahu, Adelson in America, the tribalists who demand complete obedience to policies of exclusion and ruthlessness.

Israel disgraces, tears down, ridicules Judaism, a once-living creed of compassion for, and struggling on behalf of, the dispossessed, the poor, the dissidents, yes, the Rosenbergs and Rosa Luxemburg, the avowedly radical, who have only contempt for those who rely on force, arrogance, and a sense of superiority. By that token, Peres was better than most Israelis, yet failed to stand up to fascistic tendencies of a Greater Israel. To that extent, he lent respectability and legitimation to the nation and its hard-liners by not going into unequivocal opposition. He, again, better than most, was not a son of Torah, agitating with every fiber of his being against Israelis' daily infliction of humiliation on the Palestinians. Rather than president, prime minister, etc. etc., it takes courage to say NO to the war machine, those complicit in the crimes of intervention, assassination, regime change, evident in the record of the US, which has Israel's back, as does Israel its back, whenever possible. Indeed, today in America, a self-respecting Jew cannot be critical of the policies and record of either nation. I reject that identity.

My New York Times Comment on the Cohen article (Jan. 29), same date, follows:

"And now?" Schlaim's words, "chang[ing] his image from Mr. Peace to Mr. Security," describes why Peres is not the saint, the visionary, a role we almost unanimously accord to him. The contradictions were there from the start. Advocate for military strength and nuclear development is not a harmless avocation. One pairs Peace and Security in such a way as to make them incompatible.

If Peres were truly courageous, he would have been a stronger critic of Israeli treatment of the Palestinians, and a stronger critic of Israel's international posture, which gave carte blanche to American foreign policy and tended to support dictators globally. The sad fact is that Peres is the best that Israel could produce, a giant set beside Netanyahu, but hardly a man of peace and social justice.

I regret having to say that. I am not a self-hating Jew, the conventional put-down, but one deeply admiring of Judaism, both as a world religion and beacon of freedom in years past in America. Much has changed. Israel has transformed American Jewry from a progressive social force, whether on race, politics, or economics, into a people of knee-jerk extreme conservatism and reaction. Go back to the New Deal period, a time when one could proudly, as a Jew, claim the mantle of defender of the poor, defender of labor, defender of human rights and justice.

I wish Peres had shown more guts in standing up to Israel ethnocentrism, xenophobia, and militarism. He then would deserve the eulogies.

OCTOBER 4, 2016

Capitalism Versus Militarism: The Presidency

There are no purist societal categories in the real world; everything turns on interrelatedness, particularly here, with capitalism and militarism, mutual states of national conduct and spirit, each reinforcing the other, and both exemplified in the narrow boundaries within which the American presidential campaign is being conducted.

Trump (capitalism), Clinton (militarism), constitute the perfect harmonization of interests defining the modern Fascist State, one up on Nazi Germany, Imperial Japan, and Corporatist Italy, because disguising such primal units of historically demonstrated fascism (1920s-40s) as hegemonic aspirations of global leadership, the structural interpenetration of business and government, an ideological commitment to systemic hierarchy, international and domestic, with the soothing appeal of liberalism and democracy, rhetorical gestures America's predecessors did not waste time with, in proceeding to the serious business of domination.

Pure typologies are for textbooks. In America, capitalism and militarism blended well, indeed became synchronized from at least the post-Civil War period onward, neither capitalism nor militarism capable of going it alone even as individually each grew to major proportions. There had to be overlap, with few periods of historical exception, perhaps only the New Deal, where the repair of capitalism, putting it on its feet again, consumed the energies of policy making until the Second World War became unavoidable. Then, in what still remained, by necessity, an anti-fascist crusade, nonetheless, under the umbrella of patriotism, capitalism and militarism were brought together into an uneasy coalescence.

With the Cold War, this changed, and the respective emphases in national policies were becoming inseparable, with, in America, market penetration and intervention singly and, more generally, in combination, characterizing America's pattern of development. By the 1960s, especially under Kennedy, there was very little squiggle room left between these supposedly polar types or goal posts. America's structural-political-ideological choices had narrowed successively and gradually so that, unsurprisingly, Trump and Clinton have now emerged, if not as Siamese twins joined at the hip of the highest stage of capitalism known thus far, then close to that state, where confrontation, in all areas, from military power to trade and finance, makes for an irresistible force in international politics, Russia and China, the preeminent opponents and/or targets of America's somehow-manufactured wrath.

These two exemplifications in their respective areas, Trump, capitalism, Clinton, militarism, represent mere tipping points, where, for Trump, capitalism works through, and cannot survive without, militarism, and where, for Clinton, militarism is the frosting on the cake, the ultimate good—and goal—of capitalism in protecting, chiefly for America, unilateral supremacy in world affairs. The record is there. Trump embodies capitalism better than any in our time, going back to the attitudinal complex and framework of rewards of the Robber Barons of the late 19th century, completely unapologetic in manipulating the System to his own advancement: wreck, build, it doesn't matter, even both, simultaneously, because profit is to be made, or losses stemmed, through always plunging forward, through waste, corruption, exploitation, all honorable—and honored—tools in the pursuit of wealth.

Clinton is his mirror image in the fusion of capitalism with national power, not a bone of scrupulosity in her body as she navigates the corridors of power to the top. Here Wall Street becomes the open door or avenue of systemic advancement to achieve the integrated stage of the militarization of capitalism. Not an original thinker (nor is Trump) she merely assumes, it turns out correctly, that capitalism and militarism require each other to experience growth and fruition. We see this in her prideful assertion of belting 'em down with top military brass as one of the boys, equally symbolic of underlying substance, her calling for the Afghan surge, intervention in Libya, bellicose view of Russia and China, approval of military appropriations in general (in sum, hardly out of the ordinary from her Democratic colleagues and the bipartisan consensus on American-defined globalization in all spheres of state activity, from Keystone XL to regime change in Latin America to military alliance systems worldwide).

What does this portend for the future, the Clinton-Trump race to the bottom, the ash heap of history? Nuclear war? Widening divisions at home, on race, power, income, status? Incremental worsening, wherein ethnocentrism and xenophobia find their domestic counterparts, the radical becoming the stranger, the Enemy, of America's culture and time? Whatever the outcome, and I am certainly not recommending fatalism or passivity, the future cannot be thought bright. Perhaps, with Dr. King's blessing, we can go back to the political equivalence of Du Bois's Talented Tenth, in this case, the regnant tenth who, in declaring No to both capitalism (as presently practiced) and militarism, stand witness to the degradation of democracy and refuse complicity in its emasculation and destruction.

Social protest is not dead. Not all of America is fascist-inclined. But the negation of existing practice, the disavowal of previous history (as though these features of capitalism and militarism were deterministic, rather than the result of the institutional exercise of power on behalf of wealth and the wealthy, or the morbidly assertive in generic ways of conquest), must not be given the last word. Even one-tenth of the populace are capable of raising a collective voice of protest that will be heard, if not fully in America, then still around the world. Our modern Robber Barons cum Warriors, reflected in the presidential contest, cannot be stopped, possibly even diverted, but as everyday life grows worse, as adventurism grows more obvious and unbearable to the world at charge, perhaps, just perhaps, a turnaround is possible—the futility of self-destruction finally awakening a heretofore narcotized public.

OCTOBER 5, 2016

Centrist Fascism: Lurching Forward

The third presidential debate, almost by design, was an exercise in obfuscation, neither candidate willing to display an expanded, detailed position which might reveal substance, ideology, political-economic ramifications of her/his policy on fundamental areas affecting America's domestic structure of wealth and power or its international framework of war, intervention, commercial penetration, and regime change. In other words, this was the ideal setting for personalism, a politics of distraction, as systemic-historical forces of interpenetration (of business and government), paralleled by the related development of militarism, expansion, and social regimentation have become integrated: distilled and fused as a meaningful stage of fascism in America.

This is no ordinary election, but the tipping point in the organization of capitalism as to whether “democracy,” enclosed in quotation marks because having the salience of a class-state from the society’s formation grounded in slavery, hierarchy, unequal wealth-distribution, and finally corporate/monopolistic aggrandizement, an excellent springboard to fascism under conditions of perceived decline and/or stalled internal growth (both operant today), has now turned the corner into a qualitatively different formation. I suspect this has happened gradually over the last half-century, without surrendering the inaccurate designation of democracy. It is, however, an anachronism never intended in the first place, and the candidates show at best the traits of the caudillo, a Franco or Mussolini, but still a far cry from Hitler, or America as Nazi Germany.

Exaggerating the degree of fascism serves no useful purpose. But the portents are nonetheless real, nowhere better seen than in cutting beneath the surface of the final presidential debate. The absence of policy-discussion itself mocks professions of political-ideological differentiation between the major parties. There really is very little, a consensus on the militarism-advanced capitalism nexus which by itself prevents alternative courses of action leading to other than cosmetic variants of what I am terming centrist fascism, a lockstep of ideology, structure, and political culture concentrating power of elite groups which themselves are unified in thought on what might be called full spectrum dominance, whether we speak of foreign economic policy, the environment, or other areas defining modern times.

***

There follows a closer look at the debate, the foregoing a prologue to the societal process, long in motion, of lurching (aka, staggering) forward, no longer imperceptible, gradual, toward fully consummated abandonment of democratic institutions and values. At no time before has America faced such an unenviable choice for the presidency, character flaws alone far less determining than policy consequences, in fashioning a government and polity held together by antithetical bonds of mistrust, hate, personal insecurity, and a demiurgic quest for unilateral conquest under unpropitious world conditions, circumstances of great-powers’ hostility and confrontation exacerbating near-inherent tendencies of internal militarism.

In demeanor, neither candidate appeared the paragon of intelligence or honesty, but that need not concern us. What does, is policy or the feigned absence thereof. The first question, on the powers of the Supreme Court and its judicial decisions, the issue came down to support of the Second Amendment, and despite differences on its construction, Clinton’s seeming criticisms or modifications of it become nullified by her statement, “Well, first of all, I support the second amendment.” Although she wants “reasonable regulation” and responsible use, offering more protections than Trump, who pridefully acknowledged the endorsement of the NRA, there is not the clear-cut separation of views necessary, since the issue of gun control is code for, among other things, an outright appeal to militarism, vigilantism, and race, that one looks for in attacking the prevailing gun culture.

Where differences were strong involved cultural politics, particularly abortion, in which, unlike Trump, Clinton favored Rowe v. Wade, with Trump ranting that she would be taking the baby and “rip[ping] the baby out of the womb.” My only reservation here as to the question of the candidates’ essential sameness is that, in opposition to my radical colleagues, I view cultural politics less as a test of fundamental civil liberties and civil rights than as a popular diversion from the democratization of structure, power, and the abrogation of imperialism, nuclear war, and racial discrimination.

I know how unpopular such a position is among radicals, and yes, as separate issues I'd of course favor abortion rights and those pertaining to the LGBT community as essential to the wider process of democratization, but (a) less so than equitable income-and-wealth distribution, and (b) on condition that, unlike Clinton, who treats them in a vacuum, the issues such as abortion are joined to wider issues on war and peace, corporate power, indeed, the retention of capitalism, especially in its present form. Conceivably, one could advocate for the full range of demands in cultural politics, and still favor centrist fascism in its systemic-structural-cultural attributes. Clinton embodies such a view, which is one reason I think she cannot be sufficiently distinguished from Trump. Wall Street can absorb cultural politics; it cannot, by definition, steps leading to the advent of socialism. Authenticity of, and gradations of, radicalism are matters of extreme importance, not simply for analytical purposes, but on the practice of capitalistic absorption of discontent. Currently, cultural politics are the help-mate of the status quo. I say this not as a hard-bitten Stalinist, but as an ordinary radical of the old kind.

***

The moderator Chris Wallace, turned next to the topic of immigration, where the Trumpean symbol of the Wall looms largely in the discussion. Trump summarizes, "Drugs are pouring in through the border. We have no country if we have no border. Hillary wants to give amnesty. She wants to have open borders." An open-and-shut case of principal differences? Despite her deeply moving appeal for the protection of undocumented workers (I am not being sarcastic here), and her warning that police-state tactics would be needed to enforce deportation, she still maintains: "I have been for border security for years. I voted for border security in the United States Senate. And my comprehensive immigration reform plan, of course includes border security." The continuity of proposal is not broken, only, as she notes, "I want to put our resources where I think they're most needed." Trump reminds her she voted for a wall, and her reply: "There are some limited places where that was appropriate. There also is necessarily going to be new technology and how to employ that." Clinton adds: "We will not have open borders. That is a rank mischaracterization. We will have secure borders. But we will also have reform." These are not sufficiently spelled out.

The discussion lingers. Wallace observes on open borders that in a speech Clinton "gave to a Brazilian bank for which you were paid $225,000," you said, "My dream is a hemispheric common market with open trade and open borders," to which she made qualified replied, the reference was only to energy—a step back. But then she proceeded to an interesting segue (literally without interruption): "But you [to Wallace] are very clearly quoting from WikiLeaks. What is really important about WikiLeaks is that the Russian government has engaged in espionage against Americans." Clinton is wholly dismissive of WikiLeaks's accuracy, but more, its subversive role in US affairs.

Then, she engages, as she has done before, in red-baiting, connecting Trump with Putin, and by implication selling out American interests and demonstrating softness toward Russia: "They have hacked American websites, American accounts of private people, of institutions. Then they have given that information to WikiLeaks for the purpose of putting it on the internet.” (WikiLeaks is somehow involved in the conspiracy with Russia to destroy the integrity of the American electoral system.) Then she continues: “This has come from the highest levels of the Russian government. Clearly from Putin himself in an effort, as 17 of our intelligence agencies have confirmed, to influence our election.” That isn’t enough. The noose of collaboration tightens: “So I actually think the most important question this evening, Chris, is finally, will Donald Trump admit and condemn that the Russians are doing this, and make it clear that he will not have the help of Putin in this election.” Joe McCarthy could not have said it better.

Further: “That he rejects Russian espionage against Americans, which he actually encouraged in the past. Those are the questions we need answered. We’ve never had anything like this happen in any of our elections before.” One is not persuaded by the confirmation of “17 of our intelligence agencies,” given their overriding mission to politicize intelligence for purposes of advancing the American national interest, concomitant with interfering in the elections of other nations, from foreign-aid assistance and joint treaties to dirty tricks and planned, often executed, coups. One can almost sympathize with Trump, did he not share the same argument, when he declares: “That was a great pivot off the fact that she wants open borders. Okay? How did we get on to Putin?”

That opens the way to an acerbic dialogue about the Cold War. Recently I had sought to discriminate between Trump and Clinton on the question of Russia, yet this difference is neither sufficient to disclaim their overall similarity on a broader geopolitical framework nor, here with Trump beginning to back down, his own proactive militancy in foreign policy. Neither candidate is above the use of force, both are profoundly committed to an America-first position and use of patriotism to silence opposition to US corporate privilege and supremacy in international affairs. Yet, politics is politics, and they seek a sliver of light to show who is fairest of them all. Trump: “She wants open borders. People are going to pour into our country....She wants 550% more people than Barack Obama.... [What threw me before again follows] Now we can talk about Putin. I don’t know Putin. He said nice things about me. If we got along well, that would be good. If Russia and the United States got along well and went after ISIS, that would be good.

He has no respect for her. He has no respect for our president.” Trump shares that sentiment. But then he enters deeper water: “We’re in very serious trouble. Because we have a country with tremendous nuclear warheads, 1,800, by the way. Where they expanded and we didn’t. 1,800 nuclear warheads. And she is playing chicken.” He apparently would not.

And Clinton: “Wait.” Trump: “Putin from everything I see has no respect for this person.” Clinton: “Well, that’s because he would rather have a puppet as president of the United States.” Trump: “No puppet. You’re the puppet.” That sets Clinton off in the validation of her Cold War, anti-Russian credentials: “It is pretty clear you won’t admit that the Russians have engaged in cyber attacks against the United States of America. That you encouraged espionage against our people. [She does all but call him a traitor] That you are willing to spout the Putin line, sign up for his wish list, break up NATO, do whatever he wants to do. And that you continue to get help from him because he has a very clear favorite in this race.... I find this deeply disturbing.” Clinton and Trump then go back and forth on alleged Russian hacking, she trotting out the 17 intelligence agencies, he, “Yeah, I doubt it, I doubt it.” Clinton: “He would rather believe Vladimir Putin than the military and intelligence professionals who are sworn to protect us. I find that just absolutely—“ Trump: “She doesn’t like Putin because Putin has outsmarted her at every step of the way.”

I dwell on the topic and the exchange to demonstrate Clinton's war-provoking perspective on foreign policy toward Russia. Yet on the hacking, under pressure from Wallace, Trump concedes his opposition to hacking, and in a mixed message shows ambivalence toward Russia: "I never met Putin. He is not my best friend. But if the United States got along with Russia, it wouldn't be so bad. Let me tell you, Putin has outsmarted her and Obama at every single step of the way." But "outsmarted" implies Putin cannot do that to him. On the missile treaty: "Take a look at the start-up that they signed. The Russians have said, according to many, many reports, I can't believe they allowed us to do this. They create warheads and we can't. The Russians can't believe it.... She has been outsmarted and outplayed worse than anybody I've ever seen in any government whatsoever." Clinton's response (they have drifted a long way from immigration): "I find it ironic that he is raising nuclear weapons. This is a person who has been very cavalier, even casual about the use of nuclear weapons." More bickering, she, "When the president gives the order, it must be followed," he, "I have 200 generals and admirals endorsing me, 21 congressional medal of honor recipients. As for Japan and other countries, we are being ripped off by everybody in the world." Trump's only complaint is it costs too much: "We are spending a fortune doing it. They have the bargain of the century."

***

On the economy, the third topic, the usual disagreement over taxes and regulation occurs, lower (Republican) versus higher (Democratic), but capitalism in its monopolistic form is neither under consideration nor directly amenable to regulation. Clinton's Wall Street ties are ignored by her protestations: "Well, I think the middle class thrives, America thrives. So my plan is based on growing the economy giving middle class families many more opportunities." These include a jobs program, helping small business, and making "college debt-free and for families making less than $125,000," free tuition from public colleges and universities. Less convincing, given her long-term record and more recent speaking fees, is her statement: "Most of the gains in the last years since the great recession have gone to the very top. So we are going to make the wealthy pay their fair share." Clinton calls Trump's plan, "trickle-down economics on steroids." Yes, excellent, but does hers promote the democratization of the political economy or merely attach a smattering of welfare capitalism onto a monopolistic, regulatory-favorable, trade-enhancing foundation?

Granted, differences exist within capitalism, but from the standpoint of domestic differentials of wealth and power, their plans, vision, execution (the latter, a predisposed government) closely align, Trump the more autarkic, nationalistic, Clinton, the more international, and perhaps sophisticated on matters of growth and expansion. Trump sounds like a cry-baby when it comes to taxation: "We will have a massive tax increase under Hillary Clinton's plan." He adds, "We're going to cut taxes massively. We're going to cut business taxes massively." Also, the protection afforded to Germany, Japan, South Korea, Saudi Arabia, will cost them, no more freebies. Too, the outsourcing of jobs would cease, or the products subject to heavy tariffs on their return to this country. The differences appear promising, except that only the strategies differ to the same end. Clinton: "I will not raise taxes on anyone making $250,000 or less. I also will not add a penny to the debt. I have costed out what I'm going to do." It turns out her principal economic criticism of Trump involves an increased national debt, not the fate and the condition of the working class; balanced budgets would lead to greater employment, workers themselves stalled in place, prey to alienation and consumerism.

As in other areas, the bickering continues, economic growth founded on a trickle-down context for Trump, investing “from the middle out, and the ground up,” for Clinton, but always with job creation for both divorced from structural change and government-business interpenetration. From this point, the atmosphere becomes more charged, the candidates’ interactions ruder and more unpleasant, the positions themselves less fundamental still in details and consequences, Trump boastful about personal business success, Clinton, devotion to the underprivileged and the poor, and assertion and denial of Trump’s promiscuous sexual conduct. Rather than go on, because we have already blocked out areas of major concern, I should like to comment on the entire fiasco, disguising centrist fascism as democracy. Trump himself, on sexual groping, wanted desperately to cut matters short, or rather, drop all semblance of civility: “I believe, Chris, she [Clinton] got these people to step forward. If it wasn’t, they get their ten minutes of fame, but they were all totally—it was all fiction. It was lies and it was fiction.”

What is not fiction is the similitude of antidemocratic paradigms of governance. When one cuts through the seeming differences, from gay rights and abortion to the destruction of e-mails, the qualitative level of fruitful discussion and analysis should rest on the conservation of privilege in America, its institutional expression, abidance, furtherance, and intensification, and the political underpinnings on which it rests. Hierarchy, racism, the military cast of mind, all are the logical and necessary product of America’s pattern of capitalist development, in its purist formation perverse of class consciousness and dissent, and structurally intended to ensure unequal reward and the degradation of labor. In this light, the presidential contest and resulting election make perfect sense. At one point, Trump announces, fittingly: “We fought for the right in Palm Beach to put up the American flag.” It can be said, the same holds for Chappaqua.

Trump, by refusing here to accept the results of the election point blank, has infuriated the nation, including many of his supporters, if for no other reason than because he has exposed the fragility.

OCTOBER 6, 2016

Legacy: The Gift That Destroys America

Thanks Dave Lindorff for “President Barack Obama’s Crappy Legacy,” CP, 10-5-16, an excellent overview of the devastation being left behind, on a whole range of problems, many of which have been self-created, by the outgoing Obama Administration. Before reading the article, I was contemplating a different tack, in which Obama was the mere expression, symbol, and exemplar of American policy over the long-term and America in general. Lindorff’s examples illustrate well where we’re presently at; my thinking is particularized around the contemporary meaning of fascism as applied to the United States, Obama a water boy—keeping the Nation /team supplied, not with water but the poisons of imperialism abroad, plutocracy at home, the connecting link political murder in all of its sordid manifestations, from drone assassination to intervention, confrontation, and regime change, and an intensified domestic structure and political economy of class-power and the reification of capitalistic wealth as a moral absolute.

Obama is not a causal force, but an easily replaceable object, the summation of a century-plus of societal development of capitalism-driven hegemony in world affairs—and before that, at least a half-century of industrial-financial concentration to lay the foundation for, and make practicable, the quest for unilateral global dominance. There is nothing innocent about how America assumed the historical direction it has taken. One might almost go back to John Locke himself to get a sense of the political-philosophic underpinnings for a social order identified so narrowly with individualism and self-enrichment devoid of collective obligation as to produce glaring differences in wealth, power, status by whatever it takes, including racial immiseration as a subchapter of the larger condition of labor exploitation.

America, at least since 1800, has been founded on the destruction of community (the Alien and Sedition Acts a harbinger of things to come), which is to say, with Locke, that capitalism would have a clear field for advancement and for taking on a purist complexion where property rules supreme. Repression is in America's DNA: Shooting down workers in the Great Railway Strikes of 1877 or the Bonus Marchers under Hoover are not random incidents; still less, the sustained pattern of underconsumption to keep a laboring people docile in pursuit of their class interests. In this general setting, domestic and foreign policy cannot be separated, are indivisible, with market penetration the "soft" side of imperialism (as opposed to armed intervention) while building up surplus value for the giant corporations. In the well-oiled machine of capitalism, little is left to chance—and without positing conspiracy theory, one can see how Obama, like either of his successors, Trump or Clinton, makes perfectly good sense, the historical-structural-ideological logic of the situation.

The historical boundaries of America are progressively narrowing; through concerted effort, radicalism is drying up, a broadly Left alternative seemingly out of reach. Yet, I say "seemingly," because knowing the score does not mean people have to succumb to it. The more one comes to realize the looming fascistic proportions of the society, the more incentive to fight back, not alone, which is futile, but through building a potential mass of disaffection, drawing upon a not-negligible heritage of freedom also in America's past. Consensus is an overrated thesis in taking account of the relative lack of social protest, the sameness in the political choices offered, the proneness to militarism saturating the popular culture. The Emperor (Obama) wears no clothes; he is an utter fake, worse, a traitor to the cause of people's government. That he is black is only the latest mystification surrounding the dynamics of power. If I were Dr. King or Paul Robeson I would shutter in my grave at the betrayal of social purpose, the promise of what could have been, the opportunity offered, by his election.

On every front—war, the environment, race, corporate regulation, income distribution, etc.—America is falling back, hardening in attitude, callous of all others standing in the way of omnipotence, callous of those within, who are suffering and/or have the temerity to call for increased democratization as the path to wholeness and averting catastrophe. Legacy? It is that of being on the edge and looking into the abyss of totalitarian self-encirclement having the potential of bringing the world down if the clear field for hegemony is not opened. Obama can be rated a good enough field general in preserving the work of his predecessors, immediate and distant, the work of counterrevolution in warding off rising aspirations in the Third World while maintaining a Pax Americana to supervise and be the chief beneficiary of a globalization process inimical to socialism and productive of a two-tiered international framework of advancement and retrogradation, exclusively within a capitalist orbit.

I, for one, shall not be sorry to see him leave the presidency, knowing full well that his successor and those to come after will not be any better.

OCTOBER 7, 2016

Civil Disobedience: Dr. King, America Needs You Now

At this moment, I vividly recall gathered at Brown's Church, days before the Great March at Selma, Dr. King officiating at a memorial service for the Rev. Jim Reeb, murdered the night before on the streets of Selma. We stood, clasped arms, swayed back and forth in alternate rows, singing, "Selma needs you Lord, kumbaya, Selma needs you Lord, kumaya." This is now just such a time. America needs you Lord, kumbaya. But where are the leaders to urge us on, to declare the State a militarized tyranny, to say, in simple, straightforward terms, NO, to the growing police state within, its direct complement and counterpart without, an hubristic loner in the world community unwilling to settle for anything less than global domination in all its aspects, military, political, ideological, etc.?

To be in the eye of the storm (my reference, not to Matthew) is to miss what is swirling about, perhaps rotating faster than the eye can see, the mind can grasp. But America, whether under liberalism or conservatism (both having to all intents merged as a unified expression of incipient fascism), has trespassed the bounds of international law, human decency, and, specifically at home, a moral social order which condemns militarism, violence, and not least, the growing inequality rooted in the functions, operations, and spirit of capitalism as practiced in America.

Dr. King, already implicit in the March on Washington (I recall the placards about Jobs and Freedom carried by UAW members—where are they, and labor in general, now?), had the vision of the Poor People's Campaign, which made ruling-group behavior and gross disparities in wealth and income moral issues. That is as it should be, just as today, all things hegemonic (and there are many, compressed into the symbol of armed drones for targeted assassination—the logical next step after the Nazi V-2 campaign over London), are, foremost, moral issues which by rights should condemn America in the eyes of humankind. The current presidential campaign tells us as much, rotten-to-the-core candidates unable to differentiate between construction and destruction, the latter a sign of national virility and leverage for forcing the respect of others.

Normality is anything but normal; it is the warped perspective of conquest. If one-half of the government's discretionary income is devoted to the military, what does this tell us about peaceful intent, democracy, respect for human rights, a system of laws designed to protect the weak from abuse? These are all repudiated in practice day-to-day with capitalism's mержence with the State into an integrated power system skewed in favor of wealth, influence, and, for justification, an exaggerated, brittle, class-defined ultra-patriotism. The football stadium is built on top of the nuclear stockpile, eliciting hosannas for aggression, crushing the Enemy, implied by both. (The politicization of sport is one way of inducing support for the Big Kill, and a life of conformity cheering the verities on cue.)

Can civil disobedience stand up to a social system and the generation of suitable, appropriate, consistent leadership predicated on force? Courage is in short supply in 21st century America. And courage divorced from solidarity is even more at a disadvantage. Everything about the country points to fragmentation (e.g., the selfie-craze in photos, a self-enclosing personalism which teaches self-importance over community to a society fearful of collective identities and institutions that might question unlimited wealth accumulation and invidious status rankings), so that individualism becomes a reversion to social Darwinism's affirmation of dog-eat-dog ethics. Dr. King preached love. Ethnocentrism, xenophobia, torture, brutality, these are the enemies of love, yet rife, indeed, glorified, in our midst. The moral contamination is spreading, almost reaching surge-proportions, closing off the political system, as presently found, to any truthful, trustworthy expression of democratic government. Clinton / Trump, choose your poison. Too, the economic system is closing off, the capacious umbrella of privatization enforcing the growth of massive wealth, including the reshaping of capitalism in America from a mixed industrial-financial system to one narrowly geared to financialization and the distortions thereby produced. (Little else is produced, production as such no longer the system's reason for being.)

It is no coincidence that Dr. King has no present-day replacement, just as it is no coincidence that he was assassinated in the first place, given the alignment of historical forces edging the nation toward a stage of social-economic regimentation which finds even professions of equality and justice suspect, if not intolerable—particularly in foreign policy, where anything goes thought to be to America's benefit. Rest in peace, Dr. King. Your soul should not have to be burdened with aircraft carrier battle groups pressing on China, NATO forces similarly in battle formation on the Russian borders, negotiated joint military alliances worldwide, the list near-infinitely extensible under whichever party and president in power. We who cherish your memory and what you stand for (past-tense "stood" too limiting) are still groping in the dark for want of purchase on a steep vertical cliff face with those at the top (literally) heaving boulders over the side to knock us down. American democracy is in Sisyphus-mode.

Yet, why despair? Why let the bast— get the better of us, reduce us to their level of hate, criminality, sordidness? Trump / Clinton are lightweights, compared with the noxious liberalism of Obama, a liberalism indistinguishable from the Cold War it has fostered for 2/3 of a century, most of that time impugning the integrity, and demeaning the condition, of working people, while turning somersaults for the pleasure of the wealthy. Verily, we have a class-state that Dr. King all-too-well recognized, but whose life was cut short before he was able to mount an opposition to it. Can this generation carry on his work ... before it is too late?

OCTOBER 10, 2016

The Slippery Slope: Rolling Downward, No Brakes, Nuclear War

Policy is not a discrete entity; indeed, instead, it is a cumulative force, broadening in scope and direction, as it—in this case—plunges toward self- and global-annihilation. Destruction is in the very air we breathe, as though Thanatos looming overhead, because exceptionalism is reaching a point of satiety and feelings of emptiness and alienation make other than war and dominance meaningless. Militarism gnaws at the vitals of democracy. The world knows it about America; we do not. In false modesty, we are God's chosen people of liberal humanitarianism, a.k.a., the seat of wealth and power locking world capitalism into ideological place, with special rewards and advantages for, putatively, being good global citizens. Hypocrisy knows no bounds in the eyes of the assassin (as in armed drones targeted for that purpose) and unilateral claimants of moral authority.

America was not always thus. Its mixed history contained, even under conditions of severe repression, as in plantation slavery and the struggles of industrial labor, fighting back with no little idealism against socioeconomic and structural forces of evil. Domination has, perhaps until now, never been a one-way street, even though a thirst for freedom has stopped at the water's edge (except for what I see as the necessity of World War II and, to a lesser extent, World War I, the latter nonetheless for the worse because of Wilson's hegemonic vision). In foreign policy, in general, nowhere more than now, there is an unrelenting thrust to assert force and confrontation into international politics, with unavoidable consequences for the abridgment of freedom at home. The nation is only as good as, and must be judged by, what it does overseas.

Reciprocally, what it does at home contributes directly to the nation's goals and parameters in foreign policy, the road from police state to garrison state, in neither, totally consummated, but the tendencies in both are becoming daily more evident. Through it all, capitalism, sails flying, has safe passage as the social wealth of America becomes increasingly divorced from the needs, health, and well-being of the people and subject to accumulation and consolidation into fewer hands and deeper pockets. Monopolism above, socially-induced paralysis of will below, makes for the illegitimacy of rulership when the State serves its upper groups, chiefly, its economic and military elites, to the exclusion of all else.

A class-state cannot remain static. Capital accumulation, particularly through the assistance (connivance?) of government, is self-reinforcing, until capitalism itself exhausts opportunities for further enrichment when, saturated, played out, the process is renewed again, at each stage structurally breeding more inequality, more control over government, more intolerance of opposition, more determination, more rigidification, when it comes to the deeper gradations in disparities of power in society. Capitalism is antidemocracy in spirit and practice; no wonder the importance of the military factor in its history and development since at least 1900. For America, foreign markets, as though to export surpluses which might otherwise lower price levels at home, in addition to the generous profit margins often afforded in overseas trade, are peculiarly important in capitalist development, and as such, they require constant pressures, interventionist, military and otherwise, in securing political and commercial benefits.

Likes partake of each other's features: capitalism = antidemocracy = hierarchical, systemic inequality = militarism/expansion as the singular mode of achievement for the former. One senses here the internal motion, the dynamism of repressive economic features, of what is, paradoxically, capitalistic stasis (a state of static balance or equilibrium—Webster's, but hardly meant to apply to capitalism). The more capitalism advances in form, complexity, onerousness, the more it stays the same. Thus we come, then, to the slippery slope, capitalism's downward progression (from the standpoint of structurally-inscribed equalitarianism, rule of law, and human rights), with, the momentum underway, no brakes to check its progression. At some point, currently approaching, nihilism characterizes the modal response of policy makers, and nuclear war, whether limited or full-scale, becomes thinkable, if not already being entertained.

Rolling downward. America is tilting dangerously toward fascism. Societal bonds of moral obligation to humankind, the environment, Nature in all its splendor, the historical past and future, no longer or barely exists as a defining trait of American political culture, the display and discussion of democratic values notwithstanding. The pantheon of law-making is just that (a temple dedicated to the gods, in this case, those of wealth, power, and status), wholly removed from the people in their just demands and everyday needs. For America, all three branches of government seem color coordinated (red, white, blue) in their uniform endeavor on behalf of capitalist stabilization and the status quo in class and race relations. Some tugging and hauling exists, but within predefined limits that reinforce the fundamental pattern of order, deference, the individual's self-pacification. There is no need for rage, when each has a place in the folk community of exceptionalism and capitalism.

The downward systemic progression has nothing of the teleological (design or purpose in nature) about it. It is a product of policy, turning the screws on working people and the poor, and as such, reveals its class origins, whether the skillful manipulation of banking, tariff, and tax policies, the sweetheart relation of government and media for promoting indoctrination and official truths, or the internal espionage of massive surveillance. All have as their purpose the twin-fold societal desiderata (as defined by themselves) of bestowing on elite groups the free hand for maximizing profit and privilege simultaneous with curbing social protest in case of a rise in popular awareness of the wealth-siphoning practices ideologically and every which way used against the people. As of now, this paradigm of exploitation and personal enrichment seems to be working quite well.

No brakes. Within the structure and ethics of capitalism, there are no checks on this downward progression, only its own apparent contradictions, which, in any case, do not result in obstacles to wealth-gathering and –accumulation. Stinting oneself of gain is so foreign to the individual's values and personal make-up as to permeate the mindset of the total society, which renders the working poor hostage to the social mythology presented down-the-line as ideological bait to ensure acquiescence. When a system of political economy has no checks on its immanent (here, inherent) tendencies, expect the worst—a grotesqueness and intensification of its viral (causative) attributes: war, alienation, underconsumption, a sizable differentiation of wealth and power among its people, in the case of capitalism, and more so America, in the world its purist expression.

Which leads to the third point, the potential for nuclear war. I see only America and Israel as prime instigators of such an eventuality—and hopefully, not even them. Russia and China give no indication on those lines. The problem is, one of desperation, should America see its world standing seriously diminished or undermined, increasingly likely as the international structure becomes decentralized through the rise of new centers of power. China will not go away, nor will a whole host of countries, beginning with Russia, but also, in financial-industrial terms, Japan, India, the list grows as America weakens (in all but financial schematics, more grounded in speculation than in production). Yet not economic performance that may be determinative, but ideological mindset, in facing the prospects of nuclear war. Americans have become jaded to an unbelievable extent, a dulling of political sensibility nowhere better seen than in the current election campaign, so that not even desperation takes on a hard edge, again, the slippery slope alluded to, where it becomes possible to drift into an anomic (lack of purpose or ideals) state, devil-may-care, actually welcoming self- and social-destruction.

If this state of mind persists, all the markets in the world, the unearned profits of deal-making and gunboat diplomacy, pride of ownership and the ability to press down others, will not do to feed the colossal appetite of America. Then?

OCTOBER 11, 2016

Indictment: US Guilty of War Crimes

I am sickened as I write, my country, engaged in horrible crimes against human beings, tortured, reduced to helplessness, imprisoned for years, often released subsequently without charges ... a compliant (and complicit) public, ranging from profound denial to blissful unconcern or the self-righteous expression of justifiability, forming the silent background for a tableau of dishonor and extreme cruelty. I refer to Guantanamo, but also CIA black sites scattered worldwide, sadistic personnel—jailers, physicians, psychologists and psychiatrists, lawyers, military and intelligence officers, members of Congress, Washington, America in general, right up to Obama—compliant, complicit, no, actively supportive, blood-soaked in mind and spirit, positively relishing the demonic practices, all in the name of freedom and democracy, the American Way of Life, God Himself/Herself.

I have criticized the New York Times often enough in these pages. That does not change, in most things a direct pipeline from, or reflecting the views of, the Administration; but this time, the article, “How U.S. Torture Left Legacy of Damaged Minds,” (Oct. 9), by Matt Apuzzo, Sheri Fink, and James Risen, has done the paper proud, with excellent research (as much as classification-in-place has allowed) on the details of torture, medical reports, etc., as well as legwork and photographs of former prisoners, and interviews of what detainees were subjected to and their current psychological and physical problems, heightening the impact and truth value of the report. The focus is on the aftereffects, but much is brought out about the actual torture—clearly, standard operating procedure, partly to break the will of the prisoners, partly, pure viciousness on the part of the captors—of those imprisoned.

I quote and paraphrase liberally from the report, in grateful acknowledgment of the reporters’ work. (My commentary and responses are my own.) They write that “government lawyers and intelligence officials” concluded that “none of it [torture] ... would cause long lasting psychological harm,” and, [f]ifteen years later, it is clear they were wrong.” (Like Kafka, I will identify the victims serially by an initial.) A. “describes permanent headaches and disturbed sleep, plagued by memories of dogs inside a blackened jail”; B. “is haunted by nightmares of suffocating at the bottom of a well”; C. music from a passing car “spurs rage ... reminding him of the C.i.A. prison where earsplitting music was just one assault to his senses.” So much for their alleged absence of psychological damage, years after having been released from incarceration.

The reporters speak of detainees “enduring agonizing treatment in secret C. I. A. prisons around the world or coercive practices at the military detention camp at Guantanamo Bay,” similar to what American P.O.W.’s faced “who were brutalized decades earlier by some of the world’s cruelest regimes.” Some of those [it seems a majority from the evidence presented] of those now discussed “included victims of mistaken identity or flimsy evidence that the United States later disavowed,” or were “foot soldiers ... who were later deemed to pose little threat.” “[T]he human toll,” the reporters note, “has gone largely uncalculated.”

Of those interviewed, more than half going through the C.I.A. “‘enhanced interrogation’ program” had a regimen which included “depriving them of sleep, dousing them with ice water, slamming them into walls and locking them in coffin-like boxes,” not surprisingly since showing “psychiatric problems,” e.g., PTSD, “paranoia, depression or psychosis.” In others, “the military inflicted sensory deprivation, isolation, menacing with dogs,” etc. The government never studied the long-term effects of the torture. Even during medical treatment at Guantanamo, physicians “did not ask their patients what had happened during their questioning”—profound denial all up and down the line. And when “released from American custody, some found neither help nor relief.” They had been “snatched, interrogated and imprisoned, then sent home without explanation.”

The widow of D., who had died in May, states, “He was humiliated, and that feeling never went away.” Then there was E., a 15-year-old child soldier, captured in Afghanistan, a Canadian, who, after years of imprisonment, related to his lawyer that “the American soldiers had kept him from sleeping, spit in his face and threatened him with rape[.]” In anxiety attacks he once urinated during interrogation “and soldiers had dragged him through the mess.” He said: “This is the room where they used me as a human mop.” One conscientious examining physician noted that E. had PTSD, “a conclusion the military contested.” The doctor later did research “on the effects of abusive practices,” and “found decades of papers on the issue” going back to World War II, Korea, and Vietnam, in which “[f]ormer soldiers who suffered torture or mistreatment were more likely than others to develop long-term problems.” Government’s response to such an obvious conclusion? Have a training program, SERE [Survival, Evasion, Resistance, Escape] “to resist enemy interrogators”!

Enter the psychologists, essentially to toughen up service members so they can withstand torture, professionals—in practices which the American Psychological Association has not condemned—who “gave electric shocks to dogs” as part of the experiments in developing a resistance-strategy. (The dogs were strays, then euthanized, indicative of the cynicism of all those joining in the detainee enterprise.) F. provided “the grisly details” of “water dousing,” in which he was “forced onto a plastic tarp while naked, his hands shackled above his head. Sometimes he was hooded. One C.I.A. official poured buckets of ice water on him as others lifted the tarp’s covers, sending water splashing over him and causing a choking or drowning sensation. He said he endured the treatment multiple times.”

Exceptionalism? America the Beautiful? Other techniques included “mock executions, threats to harm prisoners’ children or rape their family members, and ‘rectal feeding,’ which involved inserting liquid food supplements or puree into the rectum.” For those moving through C.I.A. jails, “interrogations were designed to disrupt the senses and increase helplessness..... Forced nudity, sensory deprivation and endless light or darkness were considered routine.” The reporters further observed, “Many of those men [from C.I.A. jails] were later released without charges, unsure of why they were held.” Senate investigators concluded, “About one in four prisoners should never have been captured, or turned out to have been misidentified by the C.I.A.” I suspect the proportion was greater.

Finally, let me look at F., “a Moroccan living in Afghanistan in 2001, [who] was held for years as a suspected member of a group linked to Al Qaeda. He said he was beaten repeatedly at a United States military jail in Kandahar and forced to watch soldiers do the same to his younger brother.” The sect he belonged to was actually “oppressed by Al Qaeda and others.” He was kept in isolation at Guantanamo, where, protesting his innocence, he was threatened, abused, shown “execution photos,” and told he would be sent to Morocco for further torture. The denouement: “After he was released last year, the United States gave him a letter saying it no longer stood by information that he was a member of a Qaeda-linked group in Morocco. Despite diplomatic assurances that he would face no charges, Morocco jailed him for several months late last year and he continues to fight allegations that he thought were behind him.” Now, he is under psychiatric care and has serious, painful symptoms.

I give F. the last word: ““They [his doctors] tell me everything is normal. Your brain is playing games. It is something mental. You’re still living in Gitmo. It’s fear.” There is more to be said, more case studies, an indictment, whether NYT’s intent (but the evidence is there) written in the blood, nervous systems, minds of the victims. The US plays hard ball. There appears to be no resting, either political party, the public at large, and when not directly implicated America has cultivated proxies worldwide to do its mission. What that mission is, I leave the reader to determine.

OCTOBER 12, 2016

Let’s Boogie-Woogie: Trump’s Propulsive Libido

[Boogie-Woogie: “a percussive style of playing blues on the piano characterized by a steady rhythmic ground bass of eighth notes in quadruple time and a series of improvised melodic variations”—Webster’s. Political translation: pound away with just enough cacophony to avoid boredom whilst spreading the message of capitalism, militarism, war, privilege, hierarchy, in sum, the fascistization of the American polity. Improvise the message with stirrings of ethnocentrism, xenophobia, and contempt for dissent and human rights, disguised with the steady beat of liberalism and patriotism, so as to appear the voice of American Exceptionalism. No, not my beloved Pete Johnson, Albert Ammons, and Meade Lux Lewis, whose eight-to-the bar piano trios sing out for emancipation—the affirmation of race, dignity, social conscience—from regimentation and second-class citizenship, but Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton, their followers, America itself, who themselves transmogrify the beauties of human freedom into the hegemonic thirst/quest of oppressing the world community and the less fortunate within our society for the sake of domination, riches, status, pure and simple. Like Ravel’s La Valse, their boogie-woogie careens out of control, spiraling into a vortex of Evil, never sated, always seeking more power, more avenues of subjugation, the rat running in circles trying to catch his/her tail.]

***

I Background. My focus here is on Trump, the glamor of easygoing fascism, sitting poolside, self-assured, sexually obsessive, morbidly accumulative, precisely one whose infantilism translates into statesmanship and deal-making, the two indistinguishable, similar to the arrogance he adopts in his approach to women (age, thirty-five and under). Hail fellow, one of the boys, what’s not to like? To answer, let’s go back a step. The brouhaha surrounding revelations of Trump’s sexism (and worse) is phony, self-serving, righteousness in the service of denial and suppression. Trump is America, and he has run afoul of its feigned prudery, which covers over its secret yearnings for everything he has done and represents. If the lid were taken off, groping would be a national pastime, but the lid—a stabilized capitalism founded on Order in its myriad guises—cannot be removed lest social discipline, as in showing deference to wealth and the wealthy, with an admixture of worship of military prestige, is diminished, and all manner of libidinal energies spill out.

America is tightly-bound in its own hypocrisy. Our novelist laureate should be Nathaniel Hawthorne, who long ago recognized the closure of the social order, in which Hester Prynne becomes the martyr-hero to America's distorted sensibility. She wore the letter "A" which could be a stand-in for the whole alphabet of neurotic fears that plagued and still plague the society, from radicalism and socialism to a common acceptance of difference and diversity. Here, Trump, unlike Clinton, is actually a breath of fresh air: unvarnished libido (primitive biological urges often goal-directed, or simply, sexual energy), which, in valuing self-indulgent pleasures might conceivably make him hesitant about blowing up the world, a potential reticence entirely foreign to Clinton's mega-belligerence and stored-up resentments. The comparison brings to mind Nietzsche, who, in The Genealogy of Morals, argued that it was precisely like what we see as the composite personality of Clinton, meanness, weakness, duplicitous, craving, and snuggling up to, power, mendacious, all summarized in the email controversy and her enabling of Bill in his affairs (while demonizing his paramours), which provided the context and personality structure of one who strikes out in vengeance at Enemies real and imagined. The strong are not so prompted; it is the weak who spew poisons at humankind.

A veiled endorsement, on my part, of Trump? Of course not. His underlying weakness is of another kind, the bully overcompensating for his barrenness as a human being. Yet with Trump, again unlike Clinton, the active nature of the Freudian pleasure principle is a check on wholesale destruction, including that of himself. The Trump-Putin connection, though hardly ratified, is not far-fetched in fact and conception. Trump endorses waterboarding, which per se puts him beyond the pale, outside the human community, still, however, less bathed in venom than Clinton, who gives every indication of wanting to stab Putin in the back, and also Xi for good measure. With Trump there is hope of avoiding nuclear war (a Trump Palace in Macau or Beijing would not, for him, be idle speculation); in Clinton's case, an ideologically-driven agenda makes anything possible.

Trump is no Nietzsche, Clinton no Hester (her quiet dignity and authentic heroic proportions), both instead crude symbols of American greed, whether of power, wealth, or the combination of the two. Even uglier, from the standpoint of a depraved mental-set, is the Republican (to the Democrats' enjoyment) growing disavowal of Trump. He at least is all surface, his lack of inhibitions tantamount to opening the safety-valve of resentments, the joie de vivre standing in marked contrast to the suspicious, censorious mind-set of his critics who dwell in a bottomless well of self-righteous negativity, hissing curses at those not thought to measure up: immigrants, the laboring poor, advocates for the democratization of power, minorities who are not given to self-debasement, those who reject militarism and the Cold War—with enough shared feeling in the other major party to define the national political ethos and mood. As fascistically-inclined as Trump is, America matches him stride for stride, with Clinton, beacon in hand, showing the way.

***

II The Debate and Its Aftermath. From the outset, the debate proved a nonstarter, not the questions, discourtesies of the candidates to each other, their facial expressions, charges and innuendoes of presidential unfitness, but the actual substance of their views, dead giveaways of an authoritarian position, of each, within the narrow compass of militarism and corporatism. Capitalist hegemony, suitably confrontational with Russia (China, not prominently featured), becomes the guiding principle of American governance in the achievement of world order and, of course, domestic business-banking regulatory structure. Personalities aside and their mutual hostility, their tricks and debating strategems, one finds, in all the posturing, a narrow band of ideological sameness, the arrogance of power reduced to two players in the same dark policy closet.

Even the first question (from the audience) elicited a response on the politicization of systemic virtue. Clinton [“on modeling appropriate and positive behavior for today’s youth”]: “...our country really is great because we’re good.” Trump’s mantra, ditto: “This is a great country.... [M]y whole concept was to make America great again.” If there is any doubt about the premise of exceptionalism and its widespread acceptance, it should be put to rest: Whatever America does is right, and neither candidate seeks to dismantle class-structure (hierarchical framework of concentrated power in upper groups) or renounce imperialism, ranging from intervention and regime change to market penetration and natural-resources extraction. Both candidates take for granted America’s unilaterally presiding over a process of global dominance supported through superior military means, including the modernization of nuclear weaponry.

There is no dissenting voice on essentials, nor the proposal of alternative strategies of domestic growth and foreign expansion. Notwithstanding rhetoric, there seems little reason for having two separate major parties. In fact, we are scraping bottom as sex—here for both an avoidance of articulating and discussing consequential societal policy and planning—takes over. Trump’s defense of engaging only in “locker room talk,” while Bill Clinton not only talked but acted, and Clinton’s emphasis on the sexual fantasies, groping, etc. of Trump, I’m tempted to say, appears as the sexualization of fascism via the trivialization and obfuscation of the electoral process.

Trump’s stock answer to Cooper, who, along with Raddatz, moderated the “debate,” on his groping and kissing women: “No, I have not. And I tell you [master of changing the subject] that I’m going to make our country safe. We’re going to have borders in our country, which we don’t have now.... We’re going to make America safe again. We’re going to make America great again, but we’re going to make America safe again.” It is as though Trump were combining anti-immigrant feeling with a generalized notion of “mak[ing] America safe,” through repetition conjuring up racist doctrine and perhaps an inclusive attack on what he perceives to be radical-ism. Clinton, not to be undone, quietly fuses the political and military dimensions of office: “I said starting back in June that he was not fit to be president and commander-in-chief,” the latter, in a presidential campaign, raised to the dignity of the former. She goes further by attaching antifeminism to her critique: “What we all saw and heard on Friday [the release of the video] was Donald talking about women, what he thinks about women, what he does to women.”

And this is still the beginning. Clinton, borrowing a talking point from Obama, continues: “So this is who Donald Trump is. And the question for us, the question our country must answer is that this is not who we are.” The problem is, it is who we are. Trump’s unwanted advances on, and to, women cannot compare with established policy, formulated and subscribed to, by Obama and the government, a structural-ideological cynicism favoring death and destruction, executed routinely on a daily basis. Lechery finds a home in national debauchery, particularly when the nation and its political leadership (on a bipartisan basis) claims ignorance and/or deniability for the promiscuous murder of others routinely labeled adversaries—a prioritizing of sin in which Authority is exempted and given a free pass. What is alarming here is less Trump’s personal conduct than the barrage of opposition (the aftermath, within his own party), which neglects the claimed-legitimacy of political murder and, doing so, risks wider war and untold misery and carnage. Trump’s sole redeeming feature is that he smokes out the same callous sense of impunity in conduct that one finds in himself; he is a miniature America.

He also, to his credit, without altering his own fascistic-inclined take on policy, is to see through Clinton. When she speaks about the goodness of America and the celebration of diversity, Trump replies, “It’s just words, folks,” and goes on to list the many promises in policy-areas left unfulfilled when, in office, she had the chance to act. Then, after give-and-take on the Trump tapes (earlier, with Howard Stern) and more about the video, he goes on the offensive: “...when Hillary brings up a point like that [the Stern tapes] and she talks about words that I said 11 years ago, I think it’s disgraceful, and I think she should be ashamed of herself, if you want to know the truth.” Clinton, of course, answers in kind: “...he gets to run his campaign any way he chooses. He gets to decide what he wants to talk about.” Additional contretemps shed little further light (Trump threatens a special prosecutor and refers to the deletion of 33,000 e-mails, while Clinton calls for more fact-checking to show Trump up), until, far along, there is discussion of the Affordable Care Act, with neither candidate seeking genuine changes in line with a single-payer system (although Trump mistakenly credits Clinton with favoring such a system).

But what I find interesting are the references to Putin and Russia, in which Clinton takes us back to the red-baiting of the 1950s. First, she charges Russia with aggression in Syria: “...think of that picture we all saw of that 4-year-old boy with the blood on his forehead because he had been bombed by the Russian and Syrian air forces.” Nominally, the point is made in connection with admitting more Syrian refugees into the United States, but, because she refuses to analyze the complexion of the rebels which she and America support against Assad, it appears the basic point is to build antagonism toward Russia: “There are children suffering in this catastrophic war, largely, I believe, because of Russian aggression.”

Clinton then links Russia up, through several steps, with Trump’s campaign: “...our intelligence community just came out and said in the last few days that the Kremlin [code, I think, for a not to subtle reference to present-day Stalinism], meaning Putin and the Russian government, are directing the attacks, the hacking on American accounts to influence our election.... We have never in the history of our country been in a situation where an adversary, a foreign power, is working so hard to influence the outcome of the election. And believe me, they’re not doing it to get me elected. They’re doing it to try to influence the election for Donald Trump.”

Here paranoia meets opportunism, and Trump rightly comes back with a declaration that may actually hold out the promise of greater peace (a salient difference between the candidates, even if Trump’s concern is sophisticated capitalism and war destructive to that end): “...I don’t know Putin. I think it would be great if we got along with Russia because we could fight ISIS together, as an example. But I don’t know Putin.” This is not a slip; he elaborates further: “But I notice, anytime anything wrong happens, they [Clinton and Democrats] like to say the Russians are—she doesn’t know if it’s the Russians doing the hacking. Maybe there is no hacking. But they always blame Russia.” Finally, he adds: “And the reason they blame Russia [is] because they think they’re trying to tarnish me with Russia. I know nothing about Russia. I know—I know about Russia, but I know nothing about the inner workings of Russia. I don’t deal there. I have no businesses there. I have no loans from Russia.” Possibly he someday envisions a Trump Tower in Red Square, but I doubt that, or rather, see it as far less dangerous to world security and the fate of the planet than Clinton’s open characterization (see above) of Russia as an adversary.

The rest I leave for the reader to discover. As for aftermath, the glee within his own party to write him off as the presidential candidate may have for its explanation, not Trump's outsized sexual ideas and conduct, but his refusal to join the anti-Russia chorus and attendant fear that he would not disfavor global accommodation. One never knows—but with Clinton a spirit of confrontation abroad, Wall Street uber alles at home, seems the path to election and comports with her personal convictions on political economy, ideology, and foreign policy. She, with the full consent and endorsement of the Democratic party, is in the forefront of military action, here: "I would go after Baghdadi. I would specifically target Baghdadi, because I think our targeting of Al Qaida leaders—and I was involved in a lot of those operations, highly classified ones—made a difference. So I think that could help." She would go further: "I would also consider arming the Kurds." On and on the march of progress. One has the sinking feeling, I have said this before, that neither candidate deserves attention and support, that America is operating in crisis mode, that the future looks grim, internally, and because of that, externally.

OCTOBER 14, 2016

Artificial Creation: Released Emails on Clinton

Chozick and Confessore's article in NYT (Oct. 10), "Hillary Clinton's Campaign Strained to Hone Her Message, Hacked Emails Show," provides an initial overview of just-released documents by WikiLeaks (readers are invited to return to the full transcript, see my excerpts on Wall Street below) damning in their indictment of Clinton's manicured campaign pored over by numerous advisers and consultants to achieve a nuanced effect of Reaction if not borderline fascism partly restrained or disguised through carefully prepared liberal rhetoric. Hillary, the billboard figure, is an empty receptacle, bending with the political wind (when absolutely necessary). Nonetheless she has a backbone of entrenched conservatism, militaristic belligerence, opportunism, suitable for presentation to an advanced capitalist society used to prevarication in the service of expansion, confrontation, and a closely stratified class system centered on global hegemony and domestic order. How does this differ from Trump, aside from style and tone? My thought is, very little. In substance and ideology, the two major parties, as tested by their foreign policies and accommodation (aka, strong support) of business, finance, and generalized corporatism symbolized by Wall Street, and their candidates, are essentially one.

The emails, the reporters note, "show a candidacy that began expecting a coronation and was thrown badly off course by a misreading of the electorate and a struggle to define what she stood for." So much for integrity and independent judgment. The correspondence, covering a nine-year period (mine: important that shows the ambitiousness, the years of preparation and grooming, etc.) "captures in detail the campaign's extreme caution and difficulty in identifying a core rationale for her candidacy, and the noisy world of advisers, friends and family members trying to exert influence." To paraphrase Pirandello, here is one character in search of power.

Even jokes at Iowa dinners were scrutinized and monitored. Denying her interest in running, Clinton assembled a staff "to wrestle with how to reposition a career politician [which she was and is, thank you Chozick and Confessore for reminding us] as an agent of change and how openly to rely on gender to stoke grass-roots enthusiasm." One aide in 2014 suggested the campaign motto: "Neither change nor continuity but the different way. The new way. She champions with clear vision and grit. We will not build the partisan ships. But rather the Ship of State flying the American Dream flag.” Whether or not employed, it reveals the artificiality and cynicism of the build-up, with “grit” one of my favorite designators, given her pride with military brass in proving herself one of the boys.

Crafted imagery, even what to say about gray hair, Palmieri, one of her advisers, saying: “More humor, first woman, ass kicker and coloring her hair.” Be all things to everyone. The reporters make an astute point: “Almost all campaigns calibrate stage craft, speeches and strategy. But the new emails seem to underscore Mrs. Clinton’s public struggles in defining her politics and her reasons for wanting to become president.” The discussions with aides “often revolved around the political advantages and pitfalls of different positions,” with little attention to what she may or may not have believed. The team “seemed consumed with positioning and optics.” What then can be said about regulation and peace, where her actions contradicted her public statements? Is there anything one can bank on—why I emphasize ambition, prevarication, and opportunism. (At least with Trump, you know what you are getting, not a composite image provided by a legion of others. Two markedly different paths to the same destination, with neither path particularly conducive to democracy and human rights.)

A case in point, 2015, is what public stand to take on Wall Street. “Her senior advisers agonized over whether she should address calls to reinstate Glass Steagall [the separation of commercial and investment banking],” another adviser, Grunwald, feared that unless Clinton endorsed it she would lose the support of Elizabeth Warren: “I understand that we face phoniness charges if we ‘change’ our position now—but we face political risks too. I worry about Elizabeth deciding to endorse Bernie [Sanders].” Clinton typically ran around end, holding that there are other ways to regulate Wall Street. On criticizing Sanders, on adopting a position about gay rights, on the private email accounts while serving as Secretary of State, Clinton and her aides went back and forth canvassing every aspect affecting her position and reputation. Even on the emails, she had high-powered consul changing “hand over” to “turn over” documents as being less pejorative. The Clinton Foundation was also a thorn in the side in how to present its role.

From the Independent, Rachael Revesz reporting (Oct. 11), we learn that Goldman Sachs paid Clinton $675,000 for speeches, and, after leaving State, she received $3M from delivering speeches on the financial circuit. For Goldman she suggested that “Wall Street insiders are what is needed to fix Wall Street.” The speech in 2013 asserted that executives were best suited to shape regulatory policy. Thus, from the transcript: “How do you get to the golden key, how do we figure out what works? And the people that know the industry better than anybody are the people who work in the industry.”

Essentially this is self-regulation under government auspices, the interpenetration of business and government, the integration of the State and capitalism, with government, as Gabriel Kolko wrote in Triumph of Conservatism long ago, providing a shield of protection for banking (and all of corporate America) against strict regulation. The transcript continues, her same speech on transparent favoritism to Wall Street: “I started traveling in February of ’09, so people could, you know, literally yell at me for the United States and our banking system causing this [financial crisis] everywhere. Now, that’s an oversimplification we know, but it was the conventional wisdom.” And Clinton hinted at the help she hoped to receive in her presidential bid: “It would be very difficult to run for president without raising a huge amount of money and without other people supporting you because your opponent will have their supporters. So I think as hard as it was when I ran [for the US Senate], I think it's even harder now."

Here, with this background, let me turn to the transcripts themselves, with attention to her views on, and speeches to, Wall Street. On Oct. 18, 2013, to the CME Group, she said: "You have to keep looking over the horizon to make choices that are not only going to benefit you but...the larger economy." Fortunately, in this feel-good address (as with her other speeches) the two coincide, Wall Street self-interest redounds to the benefit of all. She goes on: "Now, one thing that came through to me loudly and clearly as Secretary of State for four years is that you have to keep looking to the future [in that capacity it turns out, to future confrontations, interventions, and regime changes]. That's what you do, and you do it extremely well. You have to keep looking over the horizon to make choices that are going to not only benefit you but your institutions and, I would hope, the larger economy." Flattery like this qualifies her for poster girl for interpenetration; as president, which is likely, finance and banking should have no worries, other than their own mistakes that they create.

When it comes to Goldman, flattery gives way to sheer gushiness (Clinton has earned her speech fees and then some, as at a Goldman Builders and Investors Summit, Oct. 29, 2013: "Many of you in this room are masters of the trend lines. You see over the horizon, you think about products that nobody has invented, and you go about the business of trying to do just that." Goldman emerges as a world beater and savior, bringing democracy to the benighted: "But the trend lines are both positive and troubling. There is still continuing movement toward open markets, toward greater innovation, toward the development of a middle class that can buy the products. As Lloyd [Goldman CEO, on first-name basis] was talking in his intro about the work that you do creating products and then making sure there's markets by fostering the kind of inclusive prosperity that includes consumers is a positive trend in many parts of the world now. Democracy is holding its own, so people are still largely living under governments of their own choosing." The pitchwoman for American capitalism makes one aware that going head-to-head with Trump reveals little daylight between them of a systemic nature, she perhaps even more chauvinistic than he on the merits and virtues of the corporate order.

And with Morgan Stanley she reaches the sublime (April 18, 2013): "I greatly appreciate when companies, like Morgan Stanley, do work in communities here and around the world that makes a difference." As introduction to that statement, she observes: "But fundamentally, we have a system that has survived and flourished [blessed capitalism, to be sure] for so long because we recognize that beyond the contest, the competition, the moment, there are larger values and stakes that we have to keep our eyes on. I think businesses thrive when communities and countries thrive."

Goldman, Morgan Stanley, here's what she has to say to Deutsche Bank on the subject of regulation—actually self-regulation (she or an adviser must have read Kolko, although she draws the opposite conclusion, the virtues of interpenetration): "Remember what Teddy Roosevelt did. Yes, he took on what he saw as the excesses in the economy, but he also stood against the excesses in politics [i.e., authentic government supervision of banking]. He didn't want to unleash a lot of nationalist, populist reaction. He wanted to try to figure out how to get back into that balance that has served America so well over our entire nationhood [the balance between business and government, private and public interests, in both cases weighted to the former]. Today, there's more that can and should be done that really has to come from the industry itself, and how we can strengthen our economy, create more jobs at a time where that's increasingly challenging, to get back to Teddy Roosevelt's square deal." That Square Deal is, the large corporation, the major bank (remember who her audience is—Deutsche Bank), as central to social progress: "And I really believe that our country and all of you are up to that job." Clinton prefaced these remarks by stating that financial reform "really has to come from the industry itself." That refrain was certainly echoed in Bill Clinton's financial, banking, and economic policy, now continued by Mrs. Clinton.

In an AIMS Alternative Investments Symposium, Oct. 24, 2013, sponsored by Goldman, Clinton began with the same idea on proper regulation she would use throughout her speaking engagements for the firm: "The people who know the industry better than anybody are the people who work in the industry." Praise is lavished on other sponsors, Fidelity for "mak[ing] important contributions in many communities across America where you do business...." The same for Ameriprise, July 26, 2014: "So I thank you. I thank you for the work you do across our country. You contribute to Americans' financial success and security in many ways. You help families, literally, live the American dream." Finally, at the Alternative Investments Symposium, she was thanked by a Goldman officer, who said: "By the way, we really did appreciate when you were the senator from New York and your continued involvement of the issues (inaudible) to be courageous in some respects to [be] associated with Wall Street and this environment. Thank you very much." Her response: "Well, I don't feel particularly courageous. I mean, if we're going to be an effective, efficient economy, we need to have all part of that engine running well, and that includes Wall Street and Main Street." Very similar to TR, the fictive equality of both—we go up and down together—the rich and the poor are equally free to sleep under the bridge at night (Zola).

OCTOBER 24, 2016

Militarism: The Elephant in the Room

Can "fiscal responsibility" be thought value-neutral? And by fiscal, we ordinarily mean treasury policy, relating to taxation, public revenue, public debt, for the layman (myself included) a hidden, arcane world best left to technocrats and statisticians, who work in mysterious, hopefully inconsequential ways, as public policy itself, subject to the political process, is determined through the broadly reigning ideology and the electoral system. So much for textbook economics divorced from the real world. Here conservatives have always had the upper hand. Fiscal responsibility conjures up balanced budgets, both governmental and household, prudence, living within one's means, all in contrast to nasty tax-and-spend liberals, profligate, wasteful, showing no respect for honesty, hard work, structural ties that bind a social order together. But what of radicals, in contradistinction to liberals? Where do they fit in? They are, for conservatives, beyond the pale altogether, repudiating fiscal responsibility as the lodestar of capitalism, and outmoded via a framework of socialism, which can order fiscal concerns not by market imperatives but societal needs and historical conditions.

I shall take the radical position, not as conservatives, or for that matter liberals, would have it, but, still value-neutral, view fiscal responsibility as a convenience by which to define and shape public policy strictly according to social needs and a humane, pacific, equalitarian worldview. In such a framework, the chief culprit of fiscal irresponsibility is capitalism itself. Why? Because in America today, the three principal areas responsible for driving up the national debt in relation to gross domestic product are military spending, health care costs, and an inequitable system of taxation—all integral to the US in its present form: imperialism-intervention-regime change-market penetration; privatization of medicine, pharmaceutical highway robbery, ditto health insurance companies; regressive to, for extreme wealth, practically nonexistent taxation. Put together, we see a legitimated framework of exploitation which, by preserving the national debt as a guillotine over the head of society, ensures the diminution of the social welfare as people's needs remain unmet, wealth and power increasingly concentrate in fewer hands, and war, actual, potential, or made into a cultural-ideological way of life, clouds the atmosphere.

Fiscal responsibility as a capitalist shibboleth is a fraud, as a socialist—or conceivably welfare capitalist—standard, a strict and stern reminder that war and imperialism are horrendous evil, health-care needs will be satisfied as a public right, and taxation is a shared social obligation for all. There is nothing intrinsically conservative about a society keeping within its productive means: running up deficits, though ascribed to welfare programs, are, as in America, ascribable to servicing the military apparatus, subsidizing corporate advantages in domestic and world markets, and fostering through unequal wealth distribution an invidious class system. Socialism need not run up deficits because it would have the power and authority to keep everything in balance, expenditures of a humanitarian nature as well as infrastructure spending thus coming from the generation of social wealth. Welfare capitalism might have a tougher row to hoe, but the renunciation of war, a single-payer health-care system, and a steeper taxation rate on the upper tiers of wealth (along with closing the loopholes on myriad forms of tax evasion and carried interest), would at least be a useful corrective, possibly muting other areas of capitalist exploitation, including even alienation, depersonalization, and reified consumerism.

My purpose in broaching fiscal matters, in rejection of conservative orthodoxy and liberal opportunism, the first, a naked appeal to status-quo politics and structure, the second, a means of prolonging the social and cultural agonies of capitalism wrapped in the silk of progressive caring (as meanwhile war and business-government interpenetration continue), is in exposing the moral bankruptcy of America's present and future, the current presidential race merely symptomatic of the narrowness of the political-ideological pathway to incipient fascism as militarism comes further and more fully into its own. In fact, it is precisely the failure even to recognize this factor, as we are about to see, which drives this writer up the wall. The elephant in the room: the more myopic our vision, the more likely we will be stepped on (i.e., step on ourselves) and be crushed. I refer to a reasonably authoritative piece, given the stature of the authors, reflective of sane, centrist thinking, well-intentioned, yet still myopic where it counts.

One does not have to work from a Clinton-Trump adulatory-of-America context of essentials to present a critique of current thought; instead I cite the article by two esteemed establishment figures, Paul Volcker and Peter Peterson, in the New York Times, "Ignoring the Debt Problem," (Oct. 21), in which military spending, at the heart of the problem, is given half a sentence. If, in the vernacular, these are bourgeois economists/financial experts, they, within their framework of operation, have had distinguished careers and are not, for analytical purposes, sitting ducks. They begin on a strong note (my premise here, no-one benefits from escalating deficits): "Insults, invective and pandering [their reference to the campaign, "none as strange as this one"] have been poor substitutes for serious debate about the direction in which this country is going—or should be going. And a sound and sustainable fiscal structure is a key ingredient of any viable economic policy.” Whether we agree with the outcome, they are of course right, the two candidates having wholly ignored the issue of the deficit and fiscal structure, although the words “sound and sustainable” put one on guard because of past conservative usage and implication. Yet, by that token, socialism, observing these strictures (which is entirely possible) qualifies—my, not their contention—as viable economic policy.

Their concern is justified (the figures, incidentally, serving as useful guides): “Yes, this country can handle the nearly $600 billion federal deficit estimated for 2016. But the deficit has grown sharply this year, and will keep the national debt at about 75 percent of the gross domestic product, a ratio not seen since 1950, after the budget ballooned during World War II.” Their argument, or rather warning, as they proceed, is that the debt will be skyrocketing, so that the ratio of debt to G.D.P. will be such that the former greatly surpasses the latter, servicing the one then curtailing still further the social-welfare sector and affecting living standards. One sympathizes with their concern, for it challenges the cockiness of liberalism and liberals, in which Keynesianism, allowing for deficit spending (if not encouraging it), is somehow a magic bullet operant within existing capitalism through public spending, but therefore, without significant modification to the structure of capitalism itself. (This was partially the New Deal experience, where, through the National Recovery Administration, monopolism had increased, leaving a concentrated structural base in industry that would continue ever onward.)

In other words, Keynesianism made possible that capitalism could continue on as before. That is why, as I said above, the renunciation of war, a single-payer health-care system, and a steeper taxation rate on the upper tiers of wealth, all theoretically possible under capitalism, in America would be utterly chimerical, unrealizable, and almost as difficult to achieve as socialism. Keynesianism is an obvious palliative (moderating the tendencies toward, or the intensity of, unemployment, stagnation, structural breakdown). Our authors, Volcker and Peterson, partly see the danger, meeting it with lukewarm or warmed-over Keynesianism (they, far from being cliché-driven liberals or Neanderthal conservatives), and they observe: “Long-term, that continued growth, driven by our tax and spending policies [though still unable to transcend standard Republican rhetoric], will create the most significant fiscal challenge facing our country. The widely respected Congressional Budget Office has estimated that by midcentury our debt will rise to 140 percent of G. D. P., far above that in any previous era, even in times of war.”

Assuming the accuracy of the CBO estimate, one can sit back, business as usual (literally), call for a drastic overhaul of the welfare sector and discretionary spending, or—neither their nor Keynes’s chosen course—call for the overhaul of capitalism as a system, its replacement being socialism. As of now, the direction points rightward, the replacement, some form of fascism. To their credit, the authors criticize both Trump and Clinton (although clearly partial to the latter), one because he “has called for a combination of deep tax cuts that appear to far exceed proposed spending reductions,” the other because she “has set out more balanced and detailed proposals,” but which “would still fail to stabilize and reduce our debt burden.”

Their point is that “[w]hoever wins, the new president will eventually face fiscal realities that force him or her to develop strategies for decreasing the national debt as a share of the economy over the long term.” And my point, in their frame of reference, these strategies conserve capitalism still less serviceable to democratization perhaps even than currently, but that socialism in actuality does not benefit from, and could well eliminate, the nation’s debt burden. Debt, pace Keynes, serves no useful purpose, its elimination through if need be a thorough revolutionary democratization which eliminates all privilege, all waste, all surplus value, would, by necessity casting off capitalism, make of debt burdens a relic of the past.

Finally, we are able to smoke out enlightened bourgeois economics. A mechanistic (fatalistic?) grasp of interest rates is the tail wagging the dog: “Our current debt may be manageable at a time of unprecedentedly low interest rates. But if we let our debt grow, and interest rates normalize, the interest burden alone would choke our budget and squeeze out other essential spending.” Why my criticism? Because what follows is the only reference, indirect at that, to militarism, specifically, military expenditures, which are accepted as night follows day, not to be questioned, not to be linked to the debt burden and/or deficit spending: “There would be no room for the infrastructure programs and the defense rebuilding that today have wide support.” Instead, to make their case they turn to greener pastures, the means for stimulating capitalism: “It’s not just federal spending that would be squeezed. The projected rise in federal deficits would compete for funds in our capital markets and far outrun the private sector’s capacity to save, to finance industry and home purchases, and to invest abroad.” Heaven forbid such catastrophes, rendering Volcker and Peterson Keynesians in spite of themselves.

It is almost as though they are making a last ditch fight against socialism, either reduce the debt burden or face the abyss. “Instead,” they go on, “we’d be dependent on foreign investors’ acquiring most of our debt—making the government dependent on the ‘kindness of strangers’ who may not be so kind as the I.O.U.s mount up.” The frame of reference is fraying around the edges; time to dig in and make a stand: “We can’t let that happen—not if we want an America that is able to provide growth and stability at home while maintaining global leadership. We would risk returning with a vengeance to stagflation—the ugly combination of inflation and economic stagnation that we tasted in the 1970s.” Parenthetically, no-one seems to question “maintaining global leadership,” itself intimately connected to militarism, military allocations in relation to G.D.P., ditto the global ring of bases, interventions, regime changes, and the like.

So what is left? Nothing could be more incisively stated: “The solutions are clear enough. A realistic approach toward the major entitlement programs is required, given that they are projected to account for all of the growth of future noninterest spending.” (Add to militarism interest payments as nonnegotiable.) There have to be “gradual adjustments to the Social Security system” and “more efficient” health-care systems, “with better approaches toward cost control.” Whether capitalism or socialism, one can appreciate their concern over the latter (mine: socialism cannot afford to squander public resources): “Since health care represents 70 percent of the growth of our major entitlement programs over the next 30 years, bending the cost curve is essential to the long-term well-being of our economy.” Yes, provided of course bending the curve is not abused, as I believe here is the case, given the somewhat pious view on entitlements.

To be fair to Volcker and Peterson, while implicitly reducing the dimensions of the welfare state (even within a capitalist frame of reference, especially as a long-term proposition), they do build fiscal integrity into the system with respect to taxation, a cut above both conservative and liberal alternatives as commonly sought: “It’s no secret that our federal tax system is broken—unfair, inefficient and prone to political manipulation. It’s filled with exclusions, deductions, exemptions and preferential rates—so-called tax expenditures—that are ripe for reform.” This is not, however, a call for the redistribution of wealth via taxation (nor is that to be expected), but being serious about closing loopholes on a range of practices is no mean thing. At best, they make better what is within their frame of reference (I suppose an adequate definition of reform): “Those policies cost about $1.5 trillion each year and disproportionately benefit the well off [the closest they come to acknowledging the need for a redistribution of burden]. Tax reform could provide better incentives for economic growth, while raising more revenue, even as the code is simplified.”

Their final pitch—one grants their sincerity as persons of good will, nevertheless drawn inward in defense of capitalism: “But we face an immutable fact. Fair and responsible reforms will take years to implement. And businesses and individuals will need time to adjust.” Radicals would reject that immutableness, as an example of kicking the can down the road. Still the note of urgency they sound is far better than Panglossian liberalism, where the road never ends: “Delaying action now will make the needed changes only more painful and difficult later on, while also increasing the risk of financial crisis before the reforms are even made. That is why the real debate should begin immediately.” Criticizing both candidates in the final debate for “miss[ing] the opportunity to lay out their visions for a fiscally responsible, long-term future for our country,” they wittily close: “Take some advice from two observers who have been around for a while: The long term gets here before you know it.”

And it was Keynes himself who famously said, “In the long term we’ll all be dead.” No-one here has the final word, problematic that capitalism can transcend its limitations and contradictions. American militarism subjoined to a demiurge which demands global leadership, is an invitation to the fascistization of exceptionalism.

OCTOBER 25, 2016

Centrist Fascism: Lurching Forward

The third presidential debate, almost by design, was an exercise in obfuscation, neither candidate willing to display an expanded, detailed position which might reveal substance, ideology, political-economic ramifications of her/his policy on fundamental areas affecting America’s domestic structure of wealth and power or its international framework of war, intervention, commercial penetration, and regime change. In other words, this was the ideal setting for personalism, a politics of distraction, as systemic-historical forces of interpenetration (of business and government), paralleled by the related development of militarism, expansion, and social regimentation have become integrated: distilled and fused as a meaningful stage of fascism in America.

This is no ordinary election, but the tipping point in the organization of capitalism as to whether “democracy,” enclosed in quotation marks because having the salience of a class-state from the society’s formation grounded in slavery, hierarchy, unequal wealth-distribution, and finally corporate/monopolistic aggrandizement, an excellent springboard to fascism under conditions of perceived decline and/or stalled internal growth (both operant today), has now turned the corner into a qualitatively different formation. I suspect this has happened gradually over the last half-century, without surrendering the inaccurate designation of democracy. It is, however, an anachronism never intended in the first place, and the candidates show at best the traits of the caudillo, a Franco or Mussolini, but still a far cry from Hitler, or America as Nazi Germany.

Exaggerating the degree of fascism serves no useful purpose. But the portents are nonetheless real, nowhere better seen than in cutting beneath the surface of the final presidential debate. The absence of policy-discussion itself mocks professions of political-ideological differentiation between the major parties. There really is very little, a consensus on the militarism-advanced capitalism nexus which by itself prevents alternative courses of action leading to other than cosmetic variants of what I am terming centrist fascism, a lockstep of ideology, structure, and political culture concentrating power of elite groups which themselves are unified in thought on what might be called full spectrum dominance, whether we speak of foreign economic policy, the environment, or other areas defining modern times.

***

There follows a closer look at the debate, the foregoing a prologue to the societal process, long in motion, of lurching (aka, staggering) forward, no longer imperceptible, gradual, toward fully consummated abandonment of democratic institutions and values. At no time before has America faced such an unenviable choice for the presidency, character flaws alone far less determining than policy consequences, in fashioning a government and polity held together by antithetical bonds of mistrust, hate, personal insecurity, and a demiurgic quest for unilateral conquest under unpropitious world conditions, circumstances of great-powers' hostility and confrontation exacerbating near-inherent tendencies of internal militarism.

In demeanor, neither candidate appeared the paragon of intelligence or honesty, but that need not concern us. What does, is policy or the feigned absence thereof. The first question, on the powers of the Supreme Court and its judicial decisions, the issue came down to support of the Second Amendment, and despite differences on its construction, Clinton's seeming criticisms or modifications of it become nullified by her statement, "Well, first of all, I support the second amendment." Although she wants "reasonable regulation" and responsible use, offering more protections than Trump, who pridefully acknowledged the endorsement of the NRA, there is not the clear-cut separation of views necessary, since the issue of gun control is code for, among other things, an outright appeal to militarism, vigilantism, and race, that one looks for in attacking the prevailing gun culture.

Where differences were strong involved cultural politics, particularly abortion, in which, unlike Trump, Clinton favored Rowe v. Wade, with Trump ranting that she would be taking the baby and "rip[ping] the baby out of the womb." My only reservation here as to the question of the candidates' essential sameness is that, in opposition to my radical colleagues, I view cultural politics less as a test of fundamental civil liberties and civil rights than as a popular diversion from the democratization of structure, power, and the abrogation of imperialism, nuclear war, and racial discrimination.

I know how unpopular such a position is among radicals, and yes, as separate issues I'd of course favor abortion rights and those pertaining to the LGBT community as essential to the wider process of democratization, but (a) less so than equitable income-and-wealth distribution, and (b) on condition that, unlike Clinton, who treats them in a vacuum, the issues such as abortion are joined to wider issues on war and peace, corporate power, indeed, the retention of capitalism, especially in its present form. Conceivably, one could advocate for the full range of demands in cultural politics, and still favor centrist fascism in its systemic-structural-cultural attributes. Clinton embodies such a view, which is one reason I think she cannot be sufficiently distinguished from Trump. Wall Street can absorb cultural politics; it cannot, by definition, steps leading to the advent of socialism. Authenticity of, and gradations of, radicalism are matters of extreme importance, not simply for analytical purposes, but on the practice of capitalistic absorption of discontent. Currently, cultural politics are the help-mate of the status quo. I say this not as a hard-bitten Stalinist, but as an ordinary radical of the old kind.

***

The moderator Chris Wallace, turned next to the topic of immigration, where the Trumpean symbol of the Wall looms largely in the discussion. Trump summarizes, “Drugs are pouring in through the border. We have no country if we have no border. Hillary wants to give amnesty. She wants to have open borders.” An open-and-shut case of principal differences? Despite her deeply moving appeal for the protection of undocumented workers (I am not being sarcastic here), and her warning that police-state tactics would be needed to enforce deportation, she still maintains: “I have been for border security for years. I voted for border security in the United States Senate. And my comprehensive immigration reform plan, of course includes border security.” The continuity of proposal is not broken, only, as she notes, “I want to put our resources where I think they’re most needed.” Trump reminds her she voted for a wall, and her reply: “There are some limited places where that was appropriate. There also is necessarily going to be new technology and how to employ that.” Clinton adds: “We will not have open borders. That is a rank mischaracterization. We will have secure borders. But we will also have reform.” These are not sufficiently spelled out.

The discussion lingers. Wallace observes on open borders that in a speech Clinton “gave to a Brazilian bank for which you were paid $225,000,” you said, “My dream is a hemispheric common market with open trade and open borders,” to which she made qualified replied, the reference was only to energy—a step back. But then she proceeded to an interesting segue (literally without interruption): “But you [to Wallace] are very clearly quoting from WikiLeaks. What is really important about WikiLeaks is that the Russian government has engaged in espionage against Americans.” Clinton is wholly dismissive of WikiLeaks’s accuracy, but more, its subversive role in US affairs.

Then, she engages, as she has done before, in red-baiting, connecting Trump with Putin, and by implication selling out American interests and demonstrating softness toward Russia: “They have hacked American websites, American accounts of private people, of institutions. Then they have given that information to WikiLeaks for the purpose of putting it on the internet.” (WikiLeaks is somehow involved in the conspiracy with Russia to destroy the integrity of the American electoral system.) Then she continues: “This has come from the highest levels of the Russian government. Clearly from Putin himself in an effort, as 17 of our intelligence agencies have confirmed, to influence our election.” That isn’t enough. The noose of collaboration tightens: “So I actually think the most important question this evening, Chris, is finally, will Donald Trump admit and condemn that the Russians are doing this, and make it clear that he will not have the help of Putin in this election.” Joe McCarthy could not have said it better.

Further: “That he rejects Russian espionage against Americans, which he actually encouraged in the past. Those are the questions we need answered. We’ve never had anything like this happen in any of our elections before.” One is not persuaded by the confirmation of “17 of our intelligence agencies,” given their overriding mission to politicize intelligence for purposes of advancing the American national interest, concomitant with interfering in the elections of other nations, from foreign-aid assistance and joint treaties to dirty tricks and planned, often executed, coups. One can almost sympathize with Trump, did he not share the same argument, when he declares: “That was a great pivot off the fact that she wants open borders. Okay? How did we get on to Putin?”

That opens the way to an acerbic dialogue about the Cold War. Recently I had sought to discriminate between Trump and Clinton on the question of Russia, yet this difference is neither sufficient to disclaim their overall similarity on a broader geopolitical framework nor, here with Trump beginning to back down, his own proactive militancy in foreign policy. Neither candidate is above the use of force, both are profoundly committed to an America-first position and use of patriotism to silence opposition to US corporate privilege and supremacy in international affairs. Yet, politics is politics, and they seek a sliver of light to show who is fairest of them all. Trump: “She wants open borders. People are going to pour into our country....She wants 550% more people than Barack Obama.... [What threw me before again follows] Now we can talk about Putin. I don’t know Putin. He said nice things about me. If we got along well, that would be good. If Russia and the United States got along well and went after ISIS, that would be good.

He has no respect for her. He has no respect for our president.” Trump shares that sentiment. But then he enters deeper water: “We’re in very serious trouble. Because we have a country with tremendous nuclear warheads, 1,800, by the way. Where they expanded and we didn’t. 1,800 nuclear warheads. And she is playing chicken.” He apparently would not.

And Clinton: “Wait.” Trump: “Putin from everything I see has no respect for this person.” Clinton: “Well, that’s because he would rather have a puppet as president of the United States.” Trump: “No puppet. You’re the puppet.” That sets Clinton off in the validation of her Cold War, anti-Russian credentials: “It is pretty clear you won’t admit that the Russians have engaged in cyber attacks against the United States of America. That you encouraged espionage against our people. [She does all but call him a traitor] That you are willing to spout the Putin line, sign up for his wish list, break up NATO, do whatever he wants to do. And that you continue to get help from him because he has a very clear favorite in this race.... I find this deeply disturbing.” Clinton and Trump then go back and forth on alleged Russian hacking, she trotting out the 17 intelligence agencies, he, “Yeah, I doubt it, I doubt it.” Clinton: “He would rather believe Vladimir Putin than the military and intelligence professionals who are sworn to protect us. I find that just absolutely—” Trump: “She doesn’t like Putin because Putin has outsmarted her at every step of the way.”

I dwell on the topic and the exchange to demonstrate Clinton’s war-provoking perspective on foreign policy toward Russia. Yet on the hacking, under pressure from Wallace, Trump concedes his opposition to hacking, and in a mixed message shows ambivalence toward Russia: “I never met Putin. He is not my best friend. But if the United States got along with Russia, it wouldn’t be so bad. Let me tell you, Putin has outsmarted her and Obama at every single step of the way.” But “outsmarted” implies Putin cannot do that to him. On the missile treaty: “Take a look at the start-up that they signed. The Russians have said, according to many, many reports, I can’t believe they allowed us to do this. They create warheads and we can’t. The Russians can’t believe it.... She has been outsmarted and outplayed worse than anybody I’ve ever seen in any government whatsoever.” Clinton’s response (they have drifted a long way from immigration): “I find it ironic that he is raising nuclear weapons. This is a person who has been very cavalier, even casual about the use of nuclear weapons.” More bickering, she, “When the president gives the order, it must be followed,” he, “I have 200 generals and admirals endorsing me, 21 congressional medal of honor recipients. As for Japan and other countries, we are being ripped off by everybody in the world.” Trump’s only complaint is it costs too much: “We are spending a fortune doing it. They have the bargain of the century.”

***

On the economy, the third topic, the usual disagreement over taxes and regulation occurs, lower (Republican) versus higher (Democratic), but capitalism in its monopolistic form is neither under consideration nor directly amenable to regulation. Clinton’s Wall Street ties are ignored by her protestations: “Well, I think the middle class thrives, America thrives. So my plan is based on growing the economy giving middle class families many more opportunities.” These include a jobs program, helping small business, and making “college debt-free and for families making less than $125,000,” free tuition from public colleges and universities. Less convincing, given her long-term record and more recent speaking fees, is her statement: “Most of the gains in the last years since the great recession have gone to the very top. So we are going to make the wealthy pay their fair share.” Clinton calls Trump’s plan, “trickle-down economics on steroids.” Yes, excellent, but does hers promote the democratization of the political economy or merely attach a smattering of welfare capitalism onto a monopolistic, regulatory-favorable, trade-enhancing foundation?

Granted, differences exist within capitalism, but from the standpoint of domestic differentials of wealth and power, their plans, vision, execution (the latter, a predisposed government) closely align, Trump the more autarkic, nationalistic, Clinton, the more international, and perhaps sophisticated on matters of growth and expansion. Trump sounds like a cry-baby when it comes to taxation: “We will have a massive tax increase under Hillary Clinton’s plan.” He adds, “We’re going to cut taxes massively. We’re going to cut business taxes massively.” Also, the protection afforded to Germany, Japan, South Korea, Saudi Arabia, will cost them, no more freebies. Too, the outsourcing of jobs would cease, or the products subject to heavy tariffs on their return to this country. The differences appear promising, except that only the strategies differ to the same end. Clinton: “I will not raise taxes on anyone making $250,000 or less. I also will not add a penny to the debt. I have costed out what I’m going to do.” It turns out her principal economic criticism of Trump involves an increased national debt, not the fate and the condition of the working class; balanced budgets would lead to greater employment, workers themselves stalled in place, prey to alienation and consumerism.

As in other areas, the bickering continues, economic growth founded on a trickle-down context for Trump, investing “from the middle out, and the ground up,” for Clinton, but always with job creation for both divorced from structural change and government-business interpenetration. From this point, the atmosphere becomes more charged, the candidates’ interactions ruder and more unpleasant, the positions themselves less fundamental still in details and consequences, Trump boastful about personal business success, Clinton, devotion to the underprivileged and the poor, and assertion and denial of Trump’s promiscuous sexual conduct. Rather than go on, because we have already blocked out areas of major concern, I should like to comment on the entire fiasco, disguising centrist fascism as democracy. Trump himself, on sexual groping, wanted desperately to cut matters short, or rather, drop all semblance of civility: “I believe, Chris, she [Clinton] got these people to step forward. If it wasn’t, they get their ten minutes of fame, but they were all totally—it was all fiction. It was lies and it was fiction.”

What is not fiction is the similitude of antidemocratic paradigms of governance. When one cuts through the seeming differences, from gay rights and abortion to the destruction of e-mails, the qualitative level of fruitful discussion and analysis should rest on the conservation of privilege in America, its institutional expression, abidance, furtherance, and intensification, and the political underpinnings on which it rests. Hierarchy, racism, the military cast of mind, all are the logical and necessary product of America's pattern of capitalist development, in its purist formation perversive of class consciousness and dissent, and structurally intended to ensure unequal reward and the degradation of labor. In this light, the presidential contest and resulting election make perfect sense. At one point, Trump announces, fittingly: "We fought for the right in Palm Beach to put up the American flag." It can be said, the same holds for Chappaqua.

OCTOBER 27, 2016

The Election: Does It Matter Who Wins?

Antecedently, does it matter, period? America transcends its historical development, revealing a cumulative trend which pronounces even presidential elections a solemn farce, as a fascistic societal formation, to all indications, beckons. It is on a collision course with its own destiny, inner tendencies, ideology, and class distribution. Exceptionalism represents a tightly-coiled nation, out of maneuverability, fated to consume itself (and possibly the world) in domestic self-hatred, foreign aggression, and international confrontation as a permanent stance.

What happened along the way? Its unique attachment to capitalism from at least the late eighteenth century ensured a one-dimensional political-structural course which selectively eliminated, ruled out, or weakened non-capitalistic elements—a purist formation, then, feeding on itself, creating and maintaining boundaries to social change that ensured against alternative values and pathways to the future.

Whatever arises from such a context is then turned inward and made adaptable to the needs of a capitalist state and society. The Revolutionary War was one of independence, not transformation, so that America, no longer a colonial appendage of Britain, could exercise its own form of mercantilism, internal colonialism, subjection of indigenous resistance. Likewise, the Civil War cleared the historical slate of premodern capitalism, of which plantation slavery, was the linchpin, to the breakdown of all restrictions, ushering in a laissez-faire capitalism which offered no obstacles to a monopoly-capital consolidative framework.

In bold, by 1900, America now a certified imperial power, the Open Door policy pursued for three decades already ensuring the drive for universalized market penetration, and a prominent role in world affairs, witnessed the removal of slavery into a social vacuum to be replaced by the exploitation of industrial labor, an agricultural economy controlled by financial, transportation, and marketing interests, and, of course, racism per se as the unmistakable heritage of previous servitude.

What a start toward greatness (!), a background for the antidemocratic modernization up to today and into the future. Theodore Roosevelt would give us the interpenetration of business and government and the battleship navy, Woodrow Wilson, the federal reserve system, regularization of monopoly, and an internationalism inseparable from anticommunism, as witness the Siberian Intervention into the Bolshevik Revolution. By this point, the die is cast, so that throughout the 'twenties we see, via trade association activity, the privatization of the economy systemically nailed down, the NAM and Chamber of Commerce illustrative of the shaping of the business system.

The New Deal, under FDR, may be viewed, alternatively, as a break in the historical process of capitalist development, or, on close inspection, a muted effort to graft a welfare state onto business foundations—as the most American society and social structure could tolerate. But in any case, once more, at a pivotal moment, unable and unwilling to undergo a fundamental transformation. For America, World War II was, by necessity, anti-fascist on the battlefield and with international alliances, yet imperialism and anticommunism had by Bretton Woods defined the postwar vision of America's world direction, FDR's death confirming trends he might have otherwise altered or mitigated. From that point, 1945-6, no internal obstacles remained or were present to arrest the present course: a unilateral posture of global dominance. Anticommunism abroad had its corresponding red-baiting at home, leading to a long-term ideological shrinkage and encrustation of tolerated societal boundaries.

Kennedy was America's guiding spirit for the liberalization of fascism—intervention, regime change, nuclear preparedness, made acceptable and plausible through policies and rhetoric of the US as a humanitarian beacon to the world's oppressed (meanwhile enlarging global market shares, financial hegemony, and armed conflict), so that with Johnson and Vietnam America revealed its true identity, which has not changed. In this light, the present campaign and election, filled as it is with copious warnings to the world of America's greatness (coded for military supremacy), extends the past into the future, lacking only the sophistication, ideological and political, of former times able to cement the image of capitalism and democracy.

America now is nakedly belligerent, on the war path while drastically streamlining its own political economy, as, e.g., through outsourcing, industrial division of labor, and extreme emphasis on the financialization of capitalism itself, combining internal-external processes to hold its position in a world political economy and power system where unilateral prestige and military prowess no longer hold, reducing America to one among equals, an intolerable state to a nation habituated to international success. The strain is showing. Clinton and Trump are both playing to an American public coddled by decades of patriotism, antiradicalism, and, treatment of the environment is here instructive, nihilism, whether through the depredation of nature or ignorance with respect to climate change.

Clinton and Trump, and the political parties and party system that stand behind them, epitomize the logical outcome, viz., moral bankruptcy, of advanced capitalism in America, in which war, militarism, and defense budgets and production all become necessary to avoid economic stagnation or poor growth, while the ideological reproduction of exceptionalism through its various historical stages ensures a blindness to the human costs of impending war. The election is rendered meaningless because continuity has been preserved with an antiradical heritage now transposed into a setting so whipped up with neurotic frustration at having lost undisputed world supremacy and at home increasing wealth and income differentiation that a paralysis of will is setting in, making the militarization of policy (and, via massive surveillance, regimentation or stringent conformity in the political realm) not only thinkable but operable.

OCTOBER 28, 2016

America at the Crossroads: Abrogation of Democracy

Election eve, one finds the nation itself to be more pathetically unaware than the leading candidates are evil (morally reprehensible, arising from actual or imputed bad character or conduct), although the margin of difference is negligible. The crowds gathered to hear Clinton and Trump, t-shirts and hoodies decorated with campaign slogans, are two sides of the same mindless fascistic adoration of power, righteousness, indignation, a voluntary submission betraying the same ideological convictions of American exceptionalism and psychodynamics of gut hatred for and fear of difference from themselves and image of ethnocentric superiority.

Study the faces as the news cameras pan the waiting lines or audiences, smugness, occasional contorted features, feigned innocence disguising certitude. The emptiness of the American public, obediently laying down before billionaire wealth and militaristic narcissism (here self-love engendered through capitalism and assisted by compulsive attachment to the hegemonic purposes of the State). Each side, contemptuous of the other, in reality, brothers/sisters-in-arms, raises to leadership the perfect expression of their own, and hence similar if not identical, needs for recognition to cover their inner nakedness of spirit and purpose.

Trump, a bottomless pit of mammon-worship, Clinton, a sinkhole of war and aggression, express the fusion of capitalism and militarism, each in America vital to the presence and fruition of the other, that typifies the national mission of unilateral global domination. It was not always thus, although historical-institutional development pointed the direction for at least a century, when America outstripped its earlier foundations, the normalization of advanced industrial capitalism, to claim world moral-political pre-eminence based on spurious privileged association with God in carrying out His/Her divine mission of promised economic salvation.

The formula has been a surefire winner because scrupulously backed by the real or implied threat (and use) of force, a silent militarism when not engaged in war to announce global financial-and-market penetration presumed to be uncontested (or when contested, the mark of the adversary). Exceptionalism is the ideological battering ram to knock down all opposition, and for those standing in line for the political bread-and-circuses of the two major parties, a validation of their distorted hatreds brought on by their own subordination in the great chain of capitalist being.

If deep-down, though not consciously admitted, there is recognition of systemic rottenness in misshaping their yearnings and thwarting their present wellbeing and future prospects, this throws them, again both sides of the supposed political divide, into the arms of the Leadership Structure not unlike the authoritarian submission characterizing fascism in the transition from Weimar to Nazi Germany. (To be still in the transition phase and not to have as yet crossed the line, holds little promise of reversion to democratic government; too much has happened to suggest drawing back from the brink.) Collective ego-loss, seen in the faces of the ecstatic political faithful, the now-worshippers of power, goes a long way to explaining the candidates and their visions on offer.

A closed system awaits the body politic. There is little room for turning left or right, when the center subsumes an already hard-bitten right and the near-ejection of the left from the political spectrum. The vanished center, however fictitious, is kept alive for purposes of self-deception and authoritative indoctrination, a useful cloak for democratic pretensions, as meanwhile the society is placed, willingly so, on a permanent footing of structural hierarchy at home, incessant intervention abroad. The interests of capitalism must be guarded (and celebrated) at all times, lest an alternative way of life become visible, founded on humane standards of international peace and societal betterment. To break out of the present imprisonment in invidious class debasement, is more painful, given long-term ideological habituation, than risking a future of freedom (of system, of conscience, of social solidarity).

Thus, only days remain in the exercise of meaningless choice. After that, one can expect few impedances to the downward cast of policy, with increasing risks of war, class division, false consciousness to grease the rails of additional discontents as context for resentments and hatreds poisoning the atmosphere. More environmental spoliation, more gun violence, as tokens of the wayward path to fascism.

NOVEMBER 2, 2016

One Week, and Counting: Bottom-Fishing in America

Webster: frequenting the bottom. When a right-wing cell (FBI), from its inception, at the heart of government, now appears to the Left of the leading candidate for president (Clinton), one knows that she is fishing on the shoreline of fascism. From a democratic standpoint, it doesn't get any worse. Even her challenger, matching her stride for stride in vulgarian (pretentious, indecent), gut-authoritarianism, the two the Janus-faced expression of the Class-State, at least does not demonize Putin and Russia, as preparatory, in her case, to still wider confrontation, including China, as dangerously leading up to a catastrophic war, or at first the breakdown of the international order.

The FBI, from cops and robbers, to reds and fellow subversives, as television and popular opinion would have it, was a spearhead for McCarthyism and a practical annex of the House Un-American Activities Committee. Those were the days, from Baby-face Nelson to the Rosenbergs, and now, hardly chastened from its turbid (muddy, foul, opaque) past, still the guardian of American innocence, Director Comey makes one correct move to undo the legacy of J. Edgar Hoover, and the American political world falls apart. I am not a fan of Comey's for his initial exoneration of Clinton in her use of a private server at State, but surely, this is an eye-opener, about how far the political spectrum has shifted to the Far Right.

Whomever wins the election, America digs itself deeper into the cesspool of hierarchical class-differentiation, wealth-concentration, a pervasive ideological atmosphere of solipsistic hatred at home for human difference, rancid hegemony abroad for any who seek an alternative path to modernization away from the example of US petrifying capitalism. This election reveals that America, like a broken record, is stuck, playing over and over again the themes of domestic repression and foreign counterrevolution, the ideal synthesis for the unilateral assertion of world power. Neither candidate nor major party distances itself from the latter goal.

Comey, perhaps against his will and ideological proclivities, achieves standing here, merely, as he should, by doing his duty. The bipartisan consensus maneuvering in place to chastise him reveals the dark reality of a nation so devoted to denial and untruth, possibly to cover over its sins of commission (war crimes, indigenous racism and xenophobia) and omission (failure to act on environmental degradation, an adequate system of health care, a military budget crowding out the general welfare), that it has lost its way and falsified its original promised constitutional existence.

America is presently normless, and has been since capitalism inaugurated its take-off stage following the Civil War. And before that, with institutionalized slavery, internal genocidal expansion, and cap-in-hand deference to political ideologues not adverse to compromise with, if not actually representing, vested interests.

Scratch America from the democratic column, transposed now to an enlarged banana republic wherein one can expect, from either party and successful candidate, enhanced features of an already ripening Police State. Surveillance, proscription, total exclusion of viable methods, measures, and structural changes pointed toward democratization, America will formally become what it already is: a panicked response to the self-realization of its nihilistic core of moral values and systemic attributes—a nuclear-armed Goliath lacking soul and conscience, and for that reason a menace to world peace and self-renewal at home. No, Comey, by his actions, is not the enemy, but one who for the first time has put on his spectacles and looked around him. There are some things that even an ardent “patriot” cannot stomach.

I recall how in the 1960s, e.g., Mississippi Freedom Summer, the FBI would interrogate us, try to sow doubts in the hearts of the demonstrators, act as intimidators pure and simple, combined with its undercover role in breaking up antiwar protests throughout the decade, so I hardly have much hope that things have changed. Yet, my hat is off to Comey, even if only to anger Clinton, force Democrats into self-protective mode, and raise questions about the rotten stinking fish used to fertilize her and the party’s position on war and peace, capitalism (Wall Street’s Miss America), and the Clintons’ own mind-boggling accumulation of personal wealth—all of which is instinctively known by the public, but unable to extricate from the mental prison of submerged guilt for totalitarian ways and practices.

We await the election, a studied exercise in un-freedom, where tyranny of false consciousness defines the psychological mental set of America, what Adorno writing sixty-six years ago called authoritarian submission, a framework where the Leadership Principle comes to the foreground if it has not already. Parallels to the incipient stages of Nazism are not an exaggeration, and it is not a loud-mouthed Trump who is necessarily the greatest danger. He is predominantly all-surface. It is Clinton who plumbs the depths of arrogance, ambition, congealed militarism. America, R.I.P.

My New York Times Comment to its editorial, “James Comey’s Big Mistake,” 11-1-16, follows:

Comey acted honorably. Unlike Hoover, he is here depoliticizing the FBI. The Times has demonstrated such partiality to Clinton, in news selection as well as editorial opinion, that it is hard to take its criticism seriously. Endorsement is one thing, blind-siding the other side quite different. Are not emails a legitimate area of investigation? Does not the public have the right to know, especially in an election? If there is no smoking gun, this will redound to Clinton’s benefit; if there is, yes, it might change minds. But what is wrong with that?

Clinton invariably is treated with kid gloves. Even the initial issue, the use of a private server to transact government business, is forgotten. Rather than jump on Comey, why not revisit the whole question—which Comey had originally dismissed—of Clinton’s valuing of transparency, and from there (although it is now late in the game) her whole foreign policy framework and hostility, in particular, to Putin and Russia?

To criticize Clinton does not necessarily make one an apologist for Trump. Call the shots with equal endeavor; responsible journalism requires no less.

NOVEMBER 10, 2016

Establishment Liberalism: A Curse on Democracy

Clinton is defeated. The war-monger, bipartisan elite system may possibly have suffered a setback with Trump's election. It's too early to know, but if political-economic nationalism takes precedence over the belligerent, confrontational National Security State, then, despite Trump's ethnocentric framework, we are better off, as is the world, than under a Clinton-Democratic victory. The latter is the true menace in international politics, which at this point signifies greater importance than the domestic side.

Clinton was on a collision course with Putin (and possibly Xi). On a structural level, she had America poised for continuing Obama's foreign policy, from intervention, military alliances, and regime change to armed drone targeted assassination, a reprehensible chapter in American foreign relations. On a personal level, it might have been worse: her pathological aggression runs deep, a barely suppressed public effort to prove her mettle on all occasions of conflict. Behind the composed mask, one could sense her hostility toward Russia, her fear that America would appear weak unless maximum effort was applied to its containment and the ultimate removal of Putin, her profound insecurity when not engaged in the deployment of force.

This does not speak well for the Democratic party, once the champion of working-class rights and anti-fascism, but that was long ago and ended with the death of FDR and the aftermath of World War II. For two-thirds of a century, the party, marching step-by-step with Republicans, has been edging toward World War III. From think-tank policy wonks to hegemonic zealots, Clinton, her husband, and Obama, have stood out, with their sophisticated corporatism, even more than many Republicans, as purveyors of a globalization vision directly tied to the twin foundations of US business supremacy and unilateral military-ideological dominance.

A Clinton win would have been more of the same, with the continuance of Obama's massive-surveillance program at home and the promotion of finance capital as the base of economic concentration and commercial penetration abroad. No wonder the turn to Trump, although I doubt that his supporters took the measure of her record, seeing instead mere elitism per se and political ambition for its own sake. But what can we expect from Trump? Surely not a complete reversal of policy, a renunciation of conflict, a sudden awakening to the essential dignity and entitlement to human rights of all people.

Economic nationalism is not a seedbed for respect of humanity. It can too easily turn into Fortress America, possessing a xenophobic core. Trump seems part-way there already, from his statements and the disclosure of those surrounding him. Yet I am heartened if still skeptical that he may disengage—yes, call it isolationism—from America's seemingly permanent Cold-War posture, that which is the source of liberal fears, so closely identified with the National Security State, and, rather, adopt a peaceful attitude toward Russia as well as China. Cyrus Eaton, businessman from an earlier generation, thought such cooperation in world affairs could be achieved—and he was ridiculed much as Trump would be given America's vested interest in global conflict.

Liberalism has demonstrated its moral bankruptcy; for that, we have Democrats, with rare exceptions, to thank since Truman and Kennedy. Liberalism equates with imperialism and antiradicalism; radicalism does not deal in drone assassination, massive defense spending, policies tailored to further the interests of Wall Street. If for no other reason, Trump's election is welcome because, should he prove unworthy of respect, this would stand out clearly, and therefore could be opposed. With liberals, on the other hand, bread-and-circuses is a successful strategy thus far of obfuscation and creating the setting for false consciousness. Trump, preferable to Clinton, is clarity of social vision to be realized, and then radicalism, no longer suffocated, could come back into its own.

Racism divides the working class. Blacks can no longer find comfort in racial solidarity (uncritical support of Obama), just as gender—smashing glass ceilings—has also given Clinton a free pass. Both Obama and Clinton are the enemies of humankind, with their lust for war and faith in wealth. Somewhere, somehow, America must transcend its baser self, a task presently reserved for radicalism. Whether Trump proves to be just another class-enemy, or, through foreign policy reaches an accommodation with Russia and China, thus diminishing the paralysis of the Cold War, and thereby allowing for dissident thought and action to take hold, we will know the answer shortly.

NOVEMBER 17, 2016

Political System: Bottom Fishing/Opaque Shield

In this election, Trump and Clinton were both extrapolations from Obama, who in turn dates back to Truman-Kennedy and all points in between to the present, a unified structural-ideological expression of corporatist fascism characterized by successively incremental growth. 1945-2016: hermetically sealed, locked in, undeviating Cold-War nourished military-market expansion, this has been a pathway to feel-good, patriotic, liberal totalitarianism in which the business system (aka, advanced, financially-empowered capitalism) has done its work in merging war abroad with alienation at home, a desensitization to the means of achieving permanent hegemonic status in a world no longer ripe for American conquest.

The failure is manifest, not for want of trying, nor habituation to global dominance for much of the period. Slippage breeds desperation and the perception of disaster. Anything goes, for remaining on top. "Establishment" is bandied about, yet the term is accurate and aptly descriptive. America has, in practice, a ruling class, the integration of wealth, power, and legitimacy, once economically-derived, but since at least 1980 dependent for its suasion and effectiveness on military strength, sufficiently distorting the overall mix as to bear out the fascistic designation. Clinton-Obama-Trump, a tightly coiled triumvirate, despite efforts at propagandistic exaggeration and deception, reawakens the spirit of the 1930s and Axis globalization, where only FDR and the New Deal, and its world coalition, staved off aggression, defeat, mind-numbing conformity, regimentation, and subordination.

But for America, that was only an historical blip, as its own twentieth-century march to monopoly capital, an antilabor ethos, and the thrusting forward of anticommunism has been to create homogeneity and silence dissent. Backgrounds do not lie. The heavy-handed application of nuclear "diplomacy" cast a pall (a coffin-like overspreading element that produces debilitation and gloom—here though harnessed to an air of superiority and self-righteousness for those bringing it about) on the policy framework from war's aftermath, which made possible an unchallenged internal rightward direction with HUAC and McCarthyism, themselves the logical inheritance of the persecution and prosecution of the Wobblies and the Palmer Raids, pointing the way to unrelieved pressures on, if not pulverization of, a traditional Left sensibility focused on economic democratization, civil liberties, and world peace—all, by now, held in disdain and the pretext for unfolding counterrevolution.

For radicalism, we now have the titillation of cultural politics, people out on the street, while ruling groups laugh up their sleeves. Transgender bathrooms will not stop Goldman Sachs, Boeing, Monsanto, General Electric, themselves not the most powerful banking and corporate interests necessarily, as the loop of power tightens and becomes more cohesive. Obama has just let a $1B contract to the leading private prison builder for housing undocumented immigrant families, all the while Trump getting the rhetorical attention on the immigration issue, with Clinton, never far behind, wanting her own version of The Fence. And so it goes, consensus among the three, the two major parties, and much of the American public as an harmonious sounding board, with divisiveness not on militarism and war, intervention and regime change, coups and drone assassination, but abortion, glass ceilings, and cultural politics in general, “demands” utterly absorbable so long as they do not interfere with capital accumulation, class stratification, and international confrontation and combativeness.

The world is slowly beginning to withstand the pressures of United States entitlement and delusions of grandeur, both related to a system of capitalism determined at all costs on continued growth and influence when in reality the international scene has become infinitely complex. America, Russia, China, a three-legged stool, with indigenous forces and lesser “majors” crying for a seat at the table—and in time, perhaps ultimately succeeding, to the, I think, rightful diminution of US expansionism and aggrandizement (enhancement of power, wealth, position, and reputation). Totalitarian societies do not like complexity; it makes them itchy, they cannot abide by anything less than domination. American has entered that cycle, presently alone, as the two other members of the stool have more in common with each other than either has with the US.

The Trump presidency will change little, except, and importantly, if we believe he seeks a rapprochement (establishment of cordial relations) with Putin and Russia, although thus far not thought extensible to Xi and China. If so, Trump would be deemed dispensable, a betrayal of American interests, ejected from and marginalized by the Establishment. Peaceful coexistence is ridiculed today, the inner binding force for sustainment of the Cold War and militarism pure and simple, every bit as much—even the stakes seem higher—than in the 1960s-70s. We take it for granted, “free world” et. al., having been given a good head start with the enunciation of Exceptionalism since the country's founding. Ideological cornerstones are difficult to shake loose. Always a sign of moral weakness, dressed as strength, American can expect growing resistance in a changing world, particularly since, as the election testifies, it refuses itself to change.

NOVEMBER 18, 2016

Evolutionary Fascism: The American Phenomenon

Barrington Moore, in Social Origins of Dictatorship and Democracy, stated that capitalism without revolution equals fascism, implying the absence of democratization in its historical development, that resulted in a monolithic societal formation merely recapitulating its structural-ideological features as it successively evolved. The formulation forces attention to certain aspects of capitalism particularly relevant to America, perhaps a variant of world capitalism as a framework of political economy which is systemic in character, differentiated from other systems by its commodity-structure (the separation of use value and exchange value) making for a fundamental condition of alienated labor extending throughout the society as a mental-set of still more profound separation, one from another, alienation.

America shares that condition, incorporating alienation, perhaps in more intensified form than in other capitalist societies, because it did not have a feudal past, and hence, a pre-capitalist modal stage that first had to be dismantled before capitalism proper could take off. As Louis Hartz, in Liberal Tradition in America, reminds us, American capitalism was born mature, no prior structural dismantlement needed, puristic capitalism standing in clarified form from the nation's historical founding—an unwavering developmental process to this day, and no doubt beyond.

No revolution, no variegation, and rather, like a steamroller effect as pertaining to class structure, social values, wealth concentration, expansion, imperialism, the resort to war and permitting internal dissent only within acceptable boundaries. Key definitions, e.g., freedom, democracy, are deductively reached and handed down, the property right, a transcendent right, at their core, shaping the legal order and ideology alike. Other capitalist societies have richer historical backgrounds. (Japan and Germany, as exceptions, have followed a straightforward monolithic course different from, but on the essential point of the absence of revolution, the same as America's, the former two culminating in fascism, America still an outcome-in-waiting.)

Why the foregoing elaboration? Because American "democracy" has been a selective historical process identical with puristic capitalism, ruling out and/or forcibly excluding whatever detracts from a linear societal growth-pattern, capitalism in extremis, as though its survival depended on its unchanging sameness. From very early, the bias has been for counterrevolution, a state of mind applicable to both domestic and foreign affairs. "Exceptionalism," a term of patriotic endearment, can and should be regarded instead as a term of indictment and disparagement, for it sweeps social change under the rug of antiradicalism. "Democracy" becomes the enemy of democratization, a means of opposing equalitarian political-social standing and equitable wealth distribution. It has been a sham ever since upper groups broke away from colonialism in the "American Revolution," only to establish their own independent mercantilist system, hardly a revolution (and when plantation slavery is factored in, the one obstacle to puristic capitalism, the consequence is a clearing away to make room for bourgeois capitalism, confirming the non-revolutionary course).

America has been stuck in its own dithers seemingly from time immemorial, fearful of revolution from below—or elsewhere in the world, endangering its own, and the system of international, capitalism, unitary in conception, despite capitalist rivalries, in that the US identifies the maximization of its national interest through posing as the guardian of the total world system. This of course has to do with the Cold War, self-conceived on America's part as a global ideological struggle by which this nation alone can, and is qualified to, lead the "free world," against malign adversaries determined to destroy its own and that world's existence in the name of communism/socialism. Anticommunism, as the historical experience of Germany and Japan attest, is the road to fascism, and in America, immediately following World War II, it had become a national religion which, since, persists at a bedrock level of national political consciousness.

Were it otherwise, even within capitalism, as in the case of the English Civil War and the French Revolution, partially if not completely wiping the slate clean of premodern elements, America could have looked forward to a democratic future. But to start as capitalist, and then become increasingly more so, cancelled all possibilities of dialectical struggle, destining the nation to be what it has, by say 1900, become: corporatist, obsessed with power to protect its wealth, ethnocentric (not only in racist terms, but also to consign labor to, by rights, a secondary position), and a political culture predicated on waste, war, and discrimination, in contradistinction—as expected of democracies—to conservation/asceticism in all their myriad forms, international peace and, at home, nonviolence and harmonious social relations, and respect for the individual without accepting a heightened caricature of individualism.

A democracy has responsibilities to its, and all, people; America, instead, quickly devolved into a class-society of extreme wealth concentration and a greater depth of impoverishment and marginality than once cares to admit. But, am I being too theoretical, in the process painting a grossly unfair and inaccurate picture? I don't believe so, and if anything, the situation is worse, because class, power, and wealth, far from being the "normal" workings of capitalism, is here hastened on, indeed, driven forward, by the military factor, an exceptionalism of force (including, through industrial warfare, from the Knights of Labor through the C.I.O., as well as in the implementation of imperialism and market expansion) rather than of freedom.

This brings us to today, an electoral contest which perfectly summarized the historical trends of the last 125 years, America at its lowest common denominator, aggressive in the world arena, contemptuous of its people at home who fail to measure up to the standards of monopoly capital and 100% Americanism (as interpreted by ruling groups and the leadership of both major parties). Now, though, the political tables are turning between Democrats and Republicans. The party of the working class has become the party of elites, the party of wealth, now taking on a plebeian identity, in both cases setting down at the starting line—already proto-fascist—for a race to the finish. It is hard to fault Trump when Clinton is equally detestable from the standpoint of war, capitalism, and inequality, so that, rather than a lesser-of-two-evils attitude, one of plague-on-both-your-houses, deserves respect.

If there is a cancer ravaging the nation, beyond what has already been mentioned, war, militarism, a saturated capitalist polity, it is the structure and spirit of privatization per se, the all-important practical and ideological connective of capitalism to the State, a Fascist State, clothed in the garments of pseudo-democracy to neutralize and win over the working class, a critical piece in the puzzle for achieving totalitarianism. The middle class, country after country, has been or is being habituated to that end, a prime carrier of fascistic belief systems, which makes of working-class militancy and self-respect all-the-more vital to democracy, itself no longer code for capitalism, as now, but a vibrant context of human rights and mutuality both of respect and purpose. As for upper groups, why look to them for guidance and leadership, when they have created and chiefly benefited from the policies which enriched them and steered the course to ever-enlarging imperialism? The main capitalist nation in the world needs all the tricks in its arsenal and at its command if it is to stay on top.

NOVEMBER 29, 2016

Beyond “Strangelove”: America and Nuclear War

Trump, at this writing, is torn between Romney and Giuliani for Secretary of State, quite modest in differences over foreign policy and nuclear war, as alternatives go. Probably Giuliani, the more brash and outspoken of the two. But it doesn't matter; either one is capable, as is Trump, of an end-of-times scenario when circumstances, to each, seem appropriate. The circumstances? A cumulative build-up of fear, suspicion, ideologically rigid self-righteousness, when loss of honor (aka, no longer belief in capitalist global ascendancy, and domestically, a class-arranged hierarchical nation of working-people's subordination) replaces the will for legitimated world dominance on unilateral lines.

The problem is, the international system is perpetually evolving and does not stand still. America has shown the way to the militarization of hegemony, and the genie cannot be restored to the bottle. Conquest is in the air; America's future seemingly depends on it. I say “seemingly,” because what can arrest its lethality, comprehensive democratization of the social order, has no place in the US political economy (and perhaps never did) and its future planning.

From Clinton to Clinton, Obama to Trump, and why not go back (?), Kennedy to Reagan, Bush to Bush, America has had one unrelieved record of antiradicalism and counterrevolution, the two together reciprocally defined and operational, so that the boundaries of decision-making have left us, as with so much else, like the parched land of narrow desert bereft of human feeling and the affirmation of life itself.

Dr. Strangelove was thought an exaggeration in 1962, when it was released. Now it can be seen as a gross underestimation of the condensed hatreds boiling up, ostensibly, exclusively, from the working class, but actually characterizing America (which the bipartisan triumph of Reaction demonstrates by the recent election). Trump exposed the plebeian fascism of workers, Clinton, the more fully developed form for her supporters, with radicals now neutralized and worse, as an unstable numerically diminishing third force, sidetracked by cultural politics because taking on the combined power of business and the military appeared infeasible or somehow wrong. Old Left? New Left? Both swallowed up in the vortex of unremitting capitalism, its outer layer of public relations peeled away, only to reveal a totalitarian mindset of grubby aspirations for wealth, status, power, thinly disguised as individualism but intentionally fooling no-one.

To choose between Romney and Giuliani (or some general or admiral standing in the wings), like choosing between Clinton and Trump, makes a mockery of human choosing—an important part of freedom. Choice is denied away as too dangerous for running a social organization, and with it, rule of law, because in real or potential conflict with the security, identity, structural-ideological privilege, and accustomation, of upper groups who now rule un-self-consciously as mere entitlement, in the way, as they see it, of how the System was intended to be. On this, they may be right; capitalism was never intended for equitable wealth-distribution, unless as so defined by its elites. Why even pretend to justice and fairness when the facts speak otherwise? Inequality is the dynamic factor in the individual's capital-accumulation process, and society's war-making proclivities. It is what makes the sun rise and set for the vast majority of people in America today, whether demarcated by a white working class without a college degree, or a black community vulnerable to police brutality. Inequality is inscribed in the very process of Americanization: Learn to bend the knee to one's betters, memorize the traits and social values which lessen the anxieties of those in a class-position above you. Provide cannon-fodder which enables the System to realize its self-defined potential, whether aggression, suzerainty, market penetration.

The present alignment of parties, with little hope of internal or external nourishment, draws a curtain around structural-economic prospects of systemic transcendence. Is that grounds for pessimism, much less paralysis? Emphatically, resoundingly NOT. When a society has its back to the wall, as I believe America has, this is no time for retreat; for now there is nothing to lose. Internment camps may lie just around the corner for all of us—undocumented immigrants already having been served notice. (And of course, whatever happens to one segment of the population can happen to others.) Trump may not be Hitler, Clinton may not be Ilsa Koch, but they both, on occasion, give a good imitation of the genuine article. Whether coming events instill fear in those who are targeted, here insinuation, targeted defamation (rather than, as practiced abroad, targeted assassination), or simply career and other forms of discrimination, the dissenter finds himself/herself under moral obligation to offer resistance: Americanization, at its finest.

DECEMBER 5, 2016

Taiwan: A Pustule on International Politics

Ever since Sen. William Knowland of California, beginning in the late 1940s, advocated for Taiwan, Chiang, and the liquidation of Mao, China, more even than Russia, has been code for mounting America's most extreme reactionary policies, domestic and foreign. "The Fall of China" was a theme that vitalized the Right in America, feeding into HUAC, McCarthyism, an impetus to the larger Cold War itself—much of which had little to do with China, but served as a pretext for rolling back progressive energies and changes at home while simultaneously tilting US "defense" efforts increasingly toward global counterrevolution.

Not surprisingly, Taiwan is back in the news, not simply because of Trump's election and the now-famous congratulatory phone call from its "president," (quotation marks, because tokening an independence which plays into the larger scenario of a Chiang-like takeover of all of China, a militarized fascist formation aligned with America in the political-economic control of Asia), but because Trump is merely indicative of an accretive policy-making from the end of World War II to the present.

America has been on a joy ride for two-thirds of a century, bent on unilateral global hegemony, grabbing hold of every point of crisis, manufacturing many of them, for leverage in securing its position and resulting stabilization of a new status quo from which to go forward and expand. Cuba was America's Caribbean Taiwan, Chile, its South American, etc., on a world basis, wherever Left forces, threatening American interests, appeared. The result, at home, of this steady pressure, was a paralysis of will to democratize the American social system. The US is what it is: artificially fear-driven to promote the social regimentation of its people as the ratifying condition for channeling its national wealth into military spending. Behemoth swallows up decent universal health care in its maw, just as it does constructive environmental measures, and other long-suppressed needs of the people.

Trump presses the right ideological button: Taiwan, ergo gross maldistribution of wealth at home, internment camps for immigrants, witch-hunts, enforced patriotism, the liberation of fascistic tendencies among American workers (an unpalatable truth, their presence, for radicals to admit, but amply borne out by the election results), the whole ball of wax characterizing where the United States is presently at, including the ranks of both major parties. Perhaps a new plateau has now been reached, with no systemic-structural-ideological turning back, a platform-change from crypto-fascism toward the full realization of the genuine article.

But it is a mistake to put the onus on Trump alone: he is a creature of American historical development, the molding and shaping of monopoly capitalism from at least 1900 on. Most recently, Bill Clinton had sent the fleet into the China Sea and Barack Obama, with his Pacific-first strategy and Trans-Pacific Partnership, has made no secret (except for doubletalk about trade) of the military significance of his so called “pivot,” to isolate and confront China. One wonders if Trump is emboldened to act now because of Obama’s already putting the policy framework and war machinery in place with respect to China?

From the announcement of his key positions thus far, it would be fatuous and blind to think a striking escalation of American militarism is not underway. As trending thusly before, the US nevertheless appears to be embarking on the Great Leap; this kind of political nihilism finds war irresistible, and, contemptuous of establishment-thinking in foreign policy (as witness raising the Taiwan issue), as bad as such thinking is, Trump is demonstrating that he is capable of far worse. Dulles brinkmanship is child’s-play in his hands. The modern-day quintessential world capitalist is baring his fangs, showing what is implicit or latent in the politicization of such a system. The roles are inseparable, a moral bankruptcy whether the insatiable desire to acquire more property, or to display power and strength for their own sake.

America is being hung on its own petard of wealth, status, and quest for dominance—not for the nation as such, though done in its name, but its ruling circles, which, in addition to industrial-commercial-financial elites, must also include the military, an amalgam of power-interests already historically identified with early-to-middle stages of fascism. Taiwan, then, is more than a blip on the political-ideological radar screen. Its treatment—I’m waiting, e.g., to see Mattis and Flynn, both having Trump’s ear, in action—is a harbinger of things to come.

DECEMBER 30, 2016

Spectrum Shift: A Period In-Between

America self-criminalizes, as its hegemonic ambitions further expand. The spectrum shift is not mere bipartisan circularity, as may have once been the case, but something more significant: epochal political-structural change, perhaps, in near-historical time (say two-three decades), irreversible. I mean a decisively RIGHTWARD turn, however gradual-seeming the process. The US, notwithstanding science and technology, is a textbook case of systemic atavism, a reversion to type, the type being advanced—i.e., mature—capitalism requiring its increased militarization if it is to continue to expand and show a profit. Absent the New Deal, America stands in world-historical terms in the 1930s, analogous to a late stage of Weimar Germany and Imperial Japan (its formative growth). In all three cases, 2017 America, 1933 Germany, 1931 Japan, society is on the threshold of fascism.

Paths to fascism may differ, yet one cannot hide its capitalistic inner core, ever-raised to more concentrated-consolidated proportions: monopolism, cartel-organization of business, zaibatsu. It is as though capitalism were fated to summon socialism on the global scene, leaving however a sufficient imprint on socialism as to deny its fullest humane potential, while it, capitalism, in need of constant renewal, took the next step, preparation, through business development and social-cultural regimentation, of full-scale fascism. We're there, the preparation stage, gazing blind-eyed into the abyss; where once—centuries ago, republican doctrine, mid-19th to mid-20th centuries, labor struggles—freedom was in the air, now nihilism and emptiness fill the vacuum created by essentially a permanent war doctrine, a deregulatory spirit of enterprise, cynicism over democratic values and social change.

Why capitalism? Its expansion? Its militarization? Its transmogrification from Adam Smith to Barack Obama and Donald Trump, and the country bearing witness to their election, values, record? Even under Smith and his times, moral obligation was a known factor in societal relations; no longer, when a president, and this I believe symbolizes the Obama administration, a country silently and/or indifferently looking on, engages in targeted assassination, the vaporization of humans, thousands of miles away, and his successor, Trump, is already laying down the gauntlet for world (starting with regional) conflagration and a climate at home intolerant of dissent. I submit, capitalism cannot have it any other way, if everything from surplus value, avoidance of a declining rate of profit, its modern shaking down, in America, from an industrial to a financial base (calling for more outsourcing, more intervention in the affected countries), all of which is systemically-historically re-created on a daily basis, defines so well the present course. Too, the commodification of the human being, as added insurance of—although also integral to—capitalist stability and growth, must not be overlooked.

We focus on Trump, as though eight years of Obama did not create the foundations for the latter, and before that, even in the most immediate terms (not raising the whole pattern of American capitalist development), Truman, Kennedy, Reagan, the Bushes (perhaps those also not mentioned—and definitely going back further to T. Roosevelt and Wilson) prepared the way. The period in-between, referred to above, is not the usual transition or interregnum to which we are familiar, but a deeper, more profound, more overarching historical phenomenon, the potential eclipse of democracy as we know it (even when practiced so inconsistently and falsely). At least remnants are present, as is the memory, both of which are under pressure and becoming redefined to fit America's posture in a New Cold War (the last never really having ended), a silently enveloping repression in which all of the safeguards associated with the New Deal are being undone, eliminated.

Military capitalism is transmuted into American Exceptionalism. The two form a loving couple, much as do the interpenetration of business and government. State and Capitalism, promoting one another, are becoming near-interchangeable, except that now the State is more avowedly than ever a Class-State in America, reducing government's function to that of serving as the political protector and economic stimulus of first resort as well as supplying the military muscle for geopolitical global dominance, imperialism, market penetration, the traditional nuts-and-bolts of keeping capitalism going and growing, the ledger and bayonet another consanguinity of structure and purpose. We have much to look forward to, a glance in the rearview mirror helpful to our understanding and realization of continuity, so that a simplistic demonization of Trump, and consequent elevation of Obama and all that came before, does not cloud our vision of coming catastrophe.

At this historical-structural juncture, it is hard to see how America can escape the fate of fascism; if we are, as I think, in-between, not only is there, anyway, a thin line separating advanced capitalism from fascism (borne out earlier by Germany and Japan), but more to the point, there is insufficient will to draw back, to weigh democracy and fascism and determine to return to and reawaken the former. America is hoisted on its own petard (the explosive the case contains is an amalgam, beyond capitalism and militarism, of ethnocentrism, xenophobia, contempt for human excellence in non-invidious terms—or any terms), a seemingly free agent, yet chained to its evolving identity from early on, as private/corporatist business primacy in a nominally public state. Obama gave us Pacific-First with comprehensive naval-military support. Trump may cross the line. As US political leaders and military commanders are fond of saying, “All options are on the table.” Are we as a nation too jaded to savor the words, their meaning, their implication for ultimate destruction of the planet, and short of that, an extended interlude of fascistization of the global structure—also assisted by the nuclear arsenal and its threat of usage—under, now, American rather than German or Japanese leadership? What of socialism, can it withstand the falsification of humanitarian beliefs and convictions, its peculiar properties, in such circumstances? Fascism devours all before it. America sits at the table, with knife and fork at the ready.

JANUARY 3, 2017

America Deconstructed: The Great Unraveling

From Warm Springs, the modest cottage in Georgia, where Franklin Roosevelt sought relief and rehabilitation from the rigors of poliomyelitis, to Mar-a-Lago, Donald Trump’s 128-room private club and golf course in Florida, where the Nouveau Riche, the Vulgarians, gather to pleurably stew in their proto-fascistic visions and luxuriant lifestyles, marks a political-ideological journey the US historically traversed, actual and symbolic, over the last three-quarters of a century that reveals a structural descent, cumulatively unfolding, into a living hell of totalitarianism. We are getting there as a nation, from at least a formalistic democracy under the New Deal (with the capacity and will to fight world fascism) to a plutocracy—government by the wealthy—(with all stops removed to a class-state, concentrated wealth and power, the privatization of heretofore PUBLIC institutions and social-moral obligations dedicated to the people’s welfare). The eclipse of democracy, an impending decline of already weakened Constitutional principles and the rule of law, is perhaps the least of our worries, as the doctrine of permanent war, to keep capitalism solvent, express the spirit of Exceptionalism, and give vent to the fears of ethnocentrism and xenophobia, combine to define the contemporary mindset.

FDR was neither Pope John nor Eugene V. Debs, for corporate consolidation continued with the National Recovery Administration, but he could feel the pain and suffering of the people and he did provide structural limits to business-banking dominance of the polity, along with authentic welfare measures that restored dignity to the poor, the unemployed, youth, victims of a system of organized greed and selfishness. Donald Trump inherited that system and will fast bring it to greater perfection, inverting its teachings, however violated in previous practices, and promises to intensify its consequences in fashioning autarky (a Fortress America), international rivalry (a war-and-trade posture, global, but with China uppermost of concern), and, not without sadistic intent and delight, strip the society of its social safety net as trigger to reducing expectations of the people of what was once termed a decent competence.

The ambience of Mar-a-Lago comes to life, contempt for the supposed inferior, who have not made their fortunes (especially through ill-gotten riches), and deservedly merit only scorn—and humiliating treatment for their alleged failures as human beings. Perhaps that might awaken them, or the more ambitious among us (for we are them!) to the glories and our responsibilities as 100% Americans. Patriotism is in vogue, if not embroidered with a Nazi-like banner, then still recognizable for its guttural hatred of all that challenges god, country, flag, and militarism, that which alone can cleanse our fellow countrymen of their sordid betrayal of values sanctioning a rightful hegemony, absent all traces of socialism, in international politics. American GREATNESS is code for world dominance in all areas of life; arguments to the contrary are matters of unjust defamation and internal subversion.

Why this unraveling today? That of course is simplistic. America has always been prejudiced against the poor (Newport “cottages” of 100-plus rooms a precursor of Mar-a-Lago), widely interpreted to include minorities, dissenters, radicals, whomever stands in the way—certainly, gender until recent years—of the ruling groups and capitalism per se. Simplistic, in the more important sense that Trump is merely the present culmination of long-term trends, as though American history by 1800 had not already experienced an ideological-structural scrubbing that would ensure the universality of capitalistic institutions and corresponding hierarchical valuing and arrangement of social classes. Democracy wore a false mask, pace the mileage and the prestige of Jeffersonianism, throughout the period of plantation slavery, and continued in racial segregation. And what held for blacks could be used as leverage against all working people: the stamp and generalization of second-class citizenship. This antidemocratic heritage has been matched, stride for stride, by imperialism, gradually enlarging in scope to embrace both foreign markets and intervention, the latter issuing in regime change, occupation, the works.

Simplistic, then, because Trump is America’s Everyman, albeit like his invitations to Mar-a-Lago, etched in gold leaf, but typical enough in the line of postwar presidencies to qualify as one who stands in a long procession building toward present-day policy. Kennedy, without first Truman and then Eisenhower, would be incomprehensible: the Cold War is already in place, and with it, anticommunism at home to bring to a focus the paranoia and compensating ethos of claiming superiority as against all others. Ditto the years of Reagan (I still see Carter as slightly off to one side) through the Bushes, until we come to Obama, who I believe has gone 90% in the direction, and hence provided the foundation, for where Trump is heading, an all but formalized Fascist State. Intervention, drone assassination, trade adventurism (TPP), CIA-JSOC regime change, the silencing of whistle-blowers—a legacy of George Patton-Joseph McCarthy quite unlike what FDR had envisioned when he presided over WPA, CCC, and later, announcement of the Four Freedoms and its implicit inclusion of all Americans.

Bipartisan fascistization has been the norm, not the exception, throughout modern US history. Business has been allowed to expand practically without limit, banking even more so, but it is the military factor that has given American capitalism its particular identity, a capitalism bent on solipsistic force-feeding, the ingestion of world power at the expense of other nations and our own people (upwards of 90% of them). Militarism and capitalism comprise a heady brew: the martial spirit turned inward, to ensure conformity with the System as it is, and complicity with its criminal activities (as in war crimes, or more difficult to discern, legitimated violence, in which society's upper groups enjoy a privileged status, the violence practiced on those below). Bush, Clinton, Bush II, Obama, Trump, like a flight of stairs, only downward rather than upward: not a scintilla of hope that catastrophe can be avoided given the contemporary alignment of social forces. China is in the cross-hairs, but that's just for starters. Indigenous movements of protest and change are endangered throughout the globe. One-sized capitalism fits all, or had better, on pain of extinction.

Finally, don't judge Trump too harshly, unless of course one is prepared to judge his peers by the same standards as well. Obama is Trump, without the hotels! He is Cheney, without the Wyoming twang, or Bush, the Texas ranch. He is what may be termed, an ultra-imperialist statesman, using liberal cosmetics to disguise policies of repression (targeted assassination, a blip on the radar screen of evil, outweighed by policies, e.g., nuclear modernization) which can bring down the house. Trump is not thereby exempt from criticisms and responsibility; he is a distillation of American political culture (and US culture in general), rashly opinionated, inflated in self-esteem, reactionary in political-economic core beliefs, hateful of those who do not see things in the same way he/she does. This is the start of a bleak winter—not for ourselves alone, but for everyone on the planet, as America's destructive tendencies come more and more to the foreground. Sound bitter? No, I just despise an ever-renewed military build-up, covered up as the normalization of government and society. Capitalism once upon a time did not depend on militarism, nor militarism, on capitalism. When fused, as now, their integration is deadly.

JANUARY 5, 2017

The Trump Putsch: Trailblazing on the Right

"Heil, Trump!" Sound too rash, irresponsible, outlandish? I don't think so. Inaccurate, yes, in one respect: He is not alone; the entire American political system is rotten to the core, a bipartisan agreement on Russia, China, massive surveillance, targeted assassination, veneration of wealth and the wealthy, with only peripheral differences, primarily on sociocultural issues. The much vaunted distance "across the aisle," is perhaps ten centimeters, and that only to bamboozle a public already committed to patriotism, consensus, and the generic sweep of anticommunism (now manipulated in psychic energy into channels of counterterrorism).

By that token, Heil, Obama, Heil Schumer, phrases that come less easily to the tongue, because puncturing our illusions of liberalism, progressivism, radicalism, all of which (the last a possible exception) eviscerated and cannibalized by capitalism and its increasingly boon companion and soul mate, militarism. The US is on a roller coaster plunging downward to disaster, the tracks of democracy long ago worn thin and now cracking under the strain of imperialism, heavy armaments, and counterrevolution, all of which are immediately visible in the morning's paper, the evening newscast, the conversation on the street.

Americans appear to like our accustomed place as the world guardian of exploitation and reaction, proven time and again with every intervention, saber-rattling (as in the modernization of the nuclear arsenal), regime change, embargo, retaliation for practices we ourselves have tried and perfected (as in cyberwarfare and cyberespionage), a whole gamut of fascistic measures, spirit, and method, designed to guarantee America's unilateral dominance in world affairs, shaping global military, political, ideological, and trading patterns to our advantage.

In this, the Loyal Opposition has been anything but, Democrats from Truman onward, Kennedy a significant stride forward, Clinton, Big Man on (Totalitarian) Campus, and finally Obama, a TRAITOR to everything we foolishly came to believe about the Party and its record. A Loyal Accomplice is more like it. In particular, Obama's treachery (as in the abridgment of civil liberties, but perhaps more, the threat he posed to peace through a provocative confrontation with China) may someday be realized, but not now, when bread-and-circuses defines the age and its political climate.

What is better, a president, Congressional majority, Cabinet, and Party determined to destroy government, or the same, determined to use it, the State, in partnership with Capitalism, for purposes of more efficient profit-making, hierarchical structure of the polity, and militarization of the whole—all prettified as liberalism? At least Republicans are honest in their gut-nihilistic pursuit of wealth, desirous of stripping naked every safeguard to human well-being. Democrats take a more circuitous route to the same end. Prospects for democratic (small-d) social change shrivel as I write, a supine Left the Greek Chorus as witness to what is happening.

What is there for Democrats to defend? The Affordable Care Act was an abomination from the start, intended to prevent a single-payer system. On down the line, every cherished idea and program, gutted before they got off the ground. Even recent Cuban policy is a spider trap for American investment and takeover. The Nazis had the extermination camps; by popular agreement, America has merely extreme class-stratification and social regimentation. However, that seems no longer enough, for an ethos of humiliating the victims of American social workings is taking hold, the immigrant a surrogate for the struggling and dispossessed in general.

Bleak? Pessimistic? Only realistic, an attempt to penetrate the false consciousness which does not see before it the hate and contempt of what passes for social bonds and comity in America. Capitalistic foundations are part of the problem, an emphasis on exchange values drained of human content. But added to that is a history of discrimination, of ethnocentrism and xenophobia, which cannot be explained by capitalism alone, but must take into account its peculiar features in the American setting, starting with slavery, as touchstone for an exaggerated and self-justifying antiradicalism, to which assorted phobias (e.g., perfervid ideological rigidity) have naturally followed.

If anything, American influence will become magnified in the world, until forced to face an antithetical global system of numerous rival power blocs, at which time, the poisons stored up, a source of which is unconscious self-hatred for the mischief America has wrought, will seep out, with unimaginable consequences for future generations. Happy New Year.

JANUARY 6, 2017

China: Saving America From Itself

With respect to China, Trump is Obama II. He follows in perfect continuity his predecessor's belligerence in pursuing America's thirst for permanent establishment as undisputed world hegemon, only the combined resistance of Russia and China standing in America's way of its unilaterally defining the global political-structural-ideological-military framework in its favor, to which all other nations must—or so he believes—defer. Trump is no fool, unless of course a megalomaniacal AUTARKY—a self-sufficient and independent national economy (thank you, Webster’s, but also with the implicit, often actualized, policies and values of militarism for enforcement purposes)—is presumptive grounds of dangerous social insanity (which it is, historically, as confirmed by both World Wars in the twentieth century!).

The superficial difference in China policy between Obama and Trump, over whether or not to favor and work toward the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP), an Obama signature—along with his armed drone for targeted assassination—that Trump threatens to dissolve, reveals differences in levels of sophistication, but not goals as such. Each wants to cripple China’s particularly economic power so that it will not challenge US supremacy. That means an all-out geopolitical strategy of containment, isolation, and, ultimately, if not dismemberment (Taiwan’s troubled waters, clogged with troops and, in the South China Sea, carrier battle groups at the ready), then at least pressures aimed at declining Chinese strength and regional leadership. There is little to choose between Obama and Trump where it counts: alternative means to structural-ideological near-destruction (US-defined good world citizenship in obedience to America’s wishes and decisions).

In Trump’s case, an apparent liking of, and comfort with, Russia and Putin, may be less than it seems, and rather, a divide-and-conquer strategy, where uppermost is prevention of a coalition of Russia and China in resistance to America’s steadily increasing and encroaching appetite for exclusive global power. Whereas Obama has kept Russia at arm’s length, as part of a unified, supposedly new, but really continuous, Cold War, Trump peels Russia off, the better to get at China directly, a morbidity of muscle-flexing against what he realizes is America’s chief global adversary. Unlike Obama, who favors a totality of confrontation, Trump sees Russia as flaccid, lacking in will, in the final analysis, to stand up to America.

He underestimates Putin, just as he overestimates America’s military and other strengths in a multipolar world where, especially in relative terms, the US is correctly perceived as in decline, itself the tired one, torn by self-imposed demands for military supremacy at the expense of a deteriorating social safety net and crumbling infrastructure, and a consuming preoccupation with the culture wars over class, race, and gender—an emptiness of direction borne out by the essential sameness of the two political parties in their prescription for the future. In that regard, China is everything America is not. It is an ascendant world social force, as its present development projects in Africa and Latin America show, rather than ideologically trapped in a rigid ethnocentric mode. Neither Russia nor China will lie down and play dead to American ambition.

I want to be specific about China, as brought out in The Guardian (January 3) on the question of America’s confrontational posture. Its account, written by Benjamin Haas, in Hong Kong, differs from the above in texture and spirit, which, I believe, makes its evidence the more compelling. I may be set down as an America-basher, the Guardian certainly is not. Its lead, in the US briefing, under the heading, “China critic picked as Trump trade chief,” demonstrates American hostility to China beyond peradventure (not that Obama cannot match Trump stride-for-stride in this regard).

The Guardian states: “Longtime China critic and protectionist Robert Lighthizer, 69, has been selected as Donald Trump’s trade chief. The move indicates Trump intends to follow through on the tough stance he has threatened to take against China; Lighthizer has often advocated increasing tariffs and called for use of the harsher methods against China.” None of this surprises, merely confirming, without exception, Trump’s appointment-designees, all of whom are pledged to the destruction of the areas, from State to EPA, they are to preside over—a muted fascistic coup d’etat if ever there was one (Obama only steps behind, typified by his Holder appointment, running roughshod over habeas corpus rights). But as for China, the appointments carry a particular viciousness (in keeping with the autarkic foundations of his presidency).

The Guardian continues: “Lighthizer will also lightly work alongside Peter Navarro, who will lead the presidential office for US trade and industrial policy.” This is the same Navarro who characterized China’s government as a “despicable, parasitic, brutal, brass-knuckled, crass, callous, amoral, ruthless and totally totalitarian imperialist power.” Nothing is left out; he qualifies as the poet laureate of the Trump regime, a post held by Ben Rhodes under Obama. And once into the body of the article, by Haas, it only gets better.

China is quite forthright in response, its paper, Global Times, writing, “May the arrogant Americans realise that the United States of America is perhaps just a shooting star in the ample sky of history.” China will not be a pushover, and a showdown is surely in the offing. Haas notes, “Trump has packed his cabinet with tycoons, vowed to renegotiate trade deals and crack down on what he says are China’s unfair policies.” As for Lighthizer, we have a thumbnail sketch of qualifications and rectitude as Washington would have it: “Lighthizer is a former Reagan-era trade official and had a previous stint in the Office of the US Trade Representative, where he travelled the world negotiating deals to curb steel imports. He then went on to a career as a trade lawyer, representing giants such as US Steel Corp working to fend off foreign imports.” (italics, mine)

This is what we have to look forward to, utter opportunism, conflict-of-interest philosophy and conduct, the makings of incipient fascism on behalf of American business interests, or rather, that of the mega-firms and –banks: the shining head of plutocracy, as America, not satisfied with its role and status in this respect, wants ever-more wealth, power, military might. And Trump himself deftly turns the argument away from American capitalist aggrandizement by making the worker a diversion and figurehead for this endeavor. He says, Lighthizer will “fight for good trade deals that put the American worker first,” not his first pronouncement hiding behind workers to carry out policies of wealth concentration. I give the last word to Louis Kuijs, of Oxford Economics and a former senior China economist at the World Bank: “There is almost no guessing, economic policy under Trump will become more nationalistic and more interventionist. It’s very clear their policies will be especially tough on China.”

Yes, nationalistic and interventionist equals Economic Xenophobia, a we-they dichotomy with ramifications beyond the economic, and already sharpened into the hard edge of Ideology, productive of confrontation, possible aggression, and, given the current place of nihilism in the American psyche, nuclear war. And here, Trump has not yet even taken office, although the underlying transition of power will be less shaky, more continuous, than planned high drama over policy would seem to suggest. Targeted assassination, Cold War animosities and cultural lag, militarization of American capitalism (for its own sake as well as that of capitalism’s), all will continue, with the blessings of both political parties.

Perhaps, just perhaps, China can save America from itself, this, not by turning the other cheek, but by standing up to America and forcing it to recognize the limitation to its power, in that way inviting it to become a world citizen of good standing, shorn of counterrevolutionary zeal and respectful of the rights of other nations. To go from #1 global bully to achieving a more modest role in world politics would be like lifting a tremendous moral burden from US shoulders, one, however, not even recognized at present because of the tyrannous sway of Exceptionalism on the American mindset. America is past the point of self-rejuvenation; outside help is needed to bring us to our senses, where Obama and Trump are seen as equally undesirable alternatives. But then again, is there any sure corrective to the decay of democratic institutions since the close of World War II? Even China cannot, finally, be the good fairy-godmother; only America can save itself, and with it the world.

JANUARY 13, 2017

Farewell Address: Nazification of Hope

Obama's Farewell Address in Chicago, to an enraptured audience of distilled false consciousness, prettified eight years of administrative neo-fascism, seeking popular appeal and approval while simultaneously building America's war-potential, confrontational stance toward Russia and China, and, complementing this aggressiveness to complete the picture of neo-fascism, instituting measures of massive surveillance while fostering wealth concentration and laying the foundations for still deeper structural-economic corporatism than he had already inherited from his predecessors. Prettification, at the same time engaging in the opposite, a stylish mode of repression, is in fact his hallmark trait of leadership: treachery, with a golden glow. Not surprisingly, Obama's devotion to the strategy and tactic of armed drones for targeted assassination (strategy, to strike terror from above; tactic, knowingly to commit collateral damage, to break the will of the presumed adversary) follows clearly from his geopolitical framework and design, also inherited from his predecessors, and now, passed along to his successor, of unilateral globalized political-ideological dominance. So much for folksiness. One deals here with a conniving mind, utterly closed to criticism, self- or other, vindictive when crossed or the layers of arrogance revealed.

If clues to his identity were still needed, Obama's George Washington self-image making, the proverbial Man-on-Horseback of European authoritarianism, crystallized in a presumptuous Farewell Address (to the troops? The adoring public? Claims of world statesmanship, translatable into future eminence?), completes the Great Con Artist, POTUS as grifter, charlatan, guardian of the American business system (the three interchangeable). But this is not about one person, however important the office (capable of the annihilation of humankind). America thrust Obama into a position of leadership, consistent with the entire edifice of command and decision-making since World War Two, a sequential process, not deterministic, but anchored within historical boundaries within which the Cold War was perfectly predictable. Post-1945, America had no patience or respect for alternative modes of development and modernization, and instead, a puristic capitalism that would be literally a world-beater, intolerant of social transformation carrying the promise of democratization, particularly in the Third World.

Capitalism and democracy don't mix, unless, historically, capitalism in its early stages, breaking out of feudalism, still possessed features of equalitarian wealth and power, and subjected property and the property right to the rule of law (as interpreted by a still ascendant group of social forces, non-dominative in character). Nothing could be further from the American experience. Here, lacking feudal institutions, capitalism was born mature (the clarity of its practices, with even plantation slavery run as a business), and inceptively counterrevolutionary, including that of the American Revolution, which confirmed the place of indigenous elites in the class structure. But why go back that far, when our concern is the present-day fascistic-prone makeover of the American polity? Ammunition enough in what is seen before our eyes. Obama stands on the shoulders of Bush II, and Trump will do likewise on Obama's shoulders, sequential-historical totalitarianism inscribed in the workings of advanced capitalism, its monopolistic/concentrated features the natural confirmation—as is the whole parade of presidencies and politics—of an hierarchical social order wherein property, wealth, class, and status form the socioeconomic base of society. Obama is not Eugene V. Debs, nor would he particularly want to be.

In a long line of established practice, he, like his predecessors going back to Truman (Carter a partial exception), and no doubt more to come, beginning with Trump, has hewed to a line in which anticommunism was code for a societal configuration of reaction having little to do with communism, and a lot to do with whatever furthered the consolidation of capitalism, from political economy branching outward to an inclusive way of life. Obama personifies that trend and perfectly brought it forward, so that Trump could emerge as the blossoming American primrose, not a proto-fascist but simply one to restore American Greatness. As for Obama, he, with great agility, followed the totalitarian playbook, divert the gaze of the masses. That's all it takes, when the populace has already, for decades, been habituated to a hatred of others, and of those who do not fit nicely into the paradigm of patriotism at home. Demagoguery? Hardly, when there is a consonance of values centered on ethnocentrism and xenophobia. Whether the we-they dichotomy or the fear of the stranger, Americans are jumping through hoops of their own creation, an architecture of contemptuous treatment of all who do not measure up, as though societal cohesion depends on the Americanization even of the unconscious, much less, outward appearance.

Think about the speech, stripped down from setting and rhetorical devices, to the actual words, free from crowd manipulation. In reciting his record of achievement, there is not a word about armed drones for targeted assassination; not a word about modernizing the nuclear arsenal to create and ensure greater lethality (of, related to, or causing death); none about intervention, regime change, carrier battle groups adjacent to China; nada, deregulation, scrapping of important banking legislation, anti-monopolism a dead letter—and so the litany of abuse and betrayal goes on and on. I call the whole pattern, nazification because it integrates capitalism and the State into a structural monolith, the difference with Germany, in addition to the current degree of integration, is that in America the concentration camp and extermination chamber prove unnecessary when the people themselves provide for their self-pacification. Obama in his speech explicitly refers to a political formula that (perhaps without his knowing, given its wide currency) Theodore Roosevelt used in his first annual message (1901), to the same effect: We will go up or down together.

This masterful put-down of class consciousness in favor, instead, of class harmony, is key to trickle-down economics and the invitation to give one's allegiance to those in the higher classes, a surrender of class identity which goes a long way to explaining how upper social-economic groups encounter such little resistance and enjoy such privileges in a nominally democratic society. There is little wiggle-room for the expression of freedom and personal autonomy when the individual is crowded in between the walls of capitalism and the State, themselves doubly effective in defining the nature and areas of consent by their symbiotic relation as well as close integration. What could be more fertile ground for the militarization, and now, growing financialization, of American capitalism? From day one, Obama brought in his team of economy-wreckers, led by Summers and Geithner, a humongous military budget to ensure a truncated social safety net, and a health-care system cowardly set forth as the best America could do, when the single-payer system was not even fought for, let alone proposed.

America's ruling groups perhaps never had a more useful and trusted ally in the White House.

Let's consider the farewell address more carefully. Patriotic exhortation, to which the speech is directed, has one purpose, to preserve existing inequalities of wealth and power, inequalities already intensified through past practices largely, since after the New Deal, carried out on a bipartisan basis. Insinuate oneself, tugging at the heartstrings, into the confidence of the people is a favorite Caesarean manipulative device from time immemorial: "...my conversations with you, the American people—in living rooms and in schools; at farms and on factory floors; at diners and on distant military outposts—those conversations are what have kept me honest, and kept me inspired, and kept me going. And every day, I have learned from you. You made me a better president, and you made me a better man." Yes, emphatically, as in using the Espionage Act to silence whistleblowers, and follow closely the advice of Brennan on national security (e.g., waterboarding) or Clapper (e.g., massive surveillance). Modesty becomes Obama, a better man than all of us, even he, realized.

Note: he is talking to the choir (my point on false consciousness), the transcript stating (CROWD CHANTING "FOUR MORE YEARS"). You can't lose with that reception. As he continues, one wouldn't know that there was a class structure in America, one in which Obama was unduly sensitive to the needs and wishes of upper groups: "Now this is where I learned that change only happens when ordinary people get involved, and they get engaged, and they come together to demand it. After eight years as your president, I still believe that. And it's not just my belief. It's the beating heart of our American idea—our bold experiment in self-government." With rhetorical flights like that, Exceptionalism becomes written in Scripture—nothing more is needed. Here the fusion of capitalism and democracy, again, without reference to class structure, systemic inequality, an ideology of acquisition: "What a radical idea [we the people, the instrument of our democracy] the great gift that our Founders gave to us. The freedom to chase our individual dreams through our sweat, our toil, and imagination—and the imperative to strive together as well, to achieve a common good, a greater good." What greater good than capitalism, the sweat and toil of 'Ol Man River, or other maudlin image of ingratiation rushing into view!

We mustn't be boastful and overdo: "Yes, our progress has been uneven. The work of democracy has always been hard.... But the long sweep of America has been defined by forward motion, a constant widening of our founding creed to embrace all, and not just some." Whether a nod to cultural politics, the all-inclusion theme, or just currying favor, Obama is hitting his stride. No mention of unequal wealth distribution to tarnish the image, or hate-crimes, or ominous resentments directed to the world at large; instead, we read in the transcript, (APPLAUSE). Nor does it hurt to say, as he did: "We have everything we need to meet those challenges [unspecified]. After all, we remain the wealthiest, most powerful, and most respected nation on earth [for which he is taking credit]." Ah, the appeal: "But they [the Founders] knew that democracy does require a basic sense of solidarity. The idea that, for all our outward differences, we're all in this together, that we rise or fall as one." Solidarity, uber alles.

You better believe it, for what could be rosier: “The wealthy are paying a fair share of taxes. Even as the stock market shatters records, the unemployment rate is near a ten-year low.” Modesty becometh the man: “Because that, after all, is why we serve. Not to score points or take credit. But to make people’s lives better.” Then, his one acknowledgement of reality: “While the top 1 percent has amassed a bigger share of wealth and income, too many of our families in inner cities and in rural counties have been left behind.” This might have been the introduction to a message and program of social reconstruction; instead, it is forgotten. “Now there’re no quick fixes to this long-term trend.” Indeed, the culprit here, responsible for the problem (if that is admitted), “come[s] from the relentless pace of automation that makes a lot of good middle class jobs obsolete.” Discrimination based on race, good that he mentions this, is destructive to all concerned, yet the romanticization of America continues: “And we have shown that our economy doesn’t have to be a zero-sum game. Last year, incomes rose for all races, all age groups, for men and for women.” The caution about expecting too much, too soon: “But laws alone won’t be enough. Hearts must change. It won’t change overnight. Social attitudes oftentimes take generations to change.”

Perhaps if Obama left the Situation Room on Terror Tuesdays, abandoned his hit list for authorizing the evaporation of a suspected terrorist 8,000 miles away, just perhaps one would grant his integrity about wanting to bring about greater democratization at home and peace in the world. Notwithstanding the glowing rhetoric as he brings the speech to a close, we have the same old, same old, a class society of vast cleavages in wealth, power, and status, a militarization of the total culture, and a creeping authoritarianism moving America increasingly in a rightward direction. As I noted, Trump stands on Obama’s shoulders, hard for many to imagine, yet if Obama had posed a clearer alternative, an authentic quest for democracy, Trump would have been marginalized from the outset as a kook. Instead, he is the present political Savior. As for Obama, the spirit of innovation will win out: “It is that spirit—it is that spirit born of the enlightenment that made us an economic powerhouse. The spirit that took flight at Kitty Hawk and Cape Canaveral” —and the political charade continues. But with a final praise for the troops: “And all who serve or have served—it has been the honor of my lifetime to be your commander-in-chief.” Farewell, Sweet Prince.

JANUARY 23, 2017

America: Banana Republic? Far Worse

Before the Inauguration, one was guarded about using the term “fascist” to describe America, as if slanderous and an exaggeration. No longer. It is not entirely Trump’s doing; Obama and his predecessors were creeping up to that point with each intervention, confrontation, weakening of civil liberties, drone attack, regime change—a whole catalogue of death, defiance, destruction. But it is Trump who pulls America over the top, with the willing agreement of millions of Americans, a self-conscious, articulate mobocracy contemptuous of all who disagree with, yes, a fascist agenda.

That agenda is simple: capitalism and militarism merged, indivisible, monolithic, holding America in a death grip. Squeezing, choking, bullying: experience gained abroad, slowly taking effect at home. Root out the dissident. Empty the social safety net, so that ordinary people begin to think complicity, for fear of suffering hardship, a fusion of surveillance and foreclosure or even penury and want of basics. The Tale of Two Cities? No, two countries, with police-state attributes riding roughshod over the people.

Through all of this, Trump poses as the quintessential Nazi-like demagogue, giving assurances to the people, celebrating their sovereignty, and meanwhile already—his policies and personality an accurate preview—turning the screws. Listen to his introduction in his speech, unashamed playing up to The Folk, to ingratiate himself with them, as, behind our backs, the Billionaires Club is busily writing and presenting their wish list: the scrapping of every decent thing a government, hostile in the first instance to the needs and aspirations of working people and the poor, has done.

Cut trillions from the Budget. Pour much of that back into armaments, the remainder into reduced taxes for America's wealthiest. Strip away whatever is deemed superfluous for the realization of Fortress America, a Behemoth with the obsession of "greatness," aka, unilateral global domination behind high protective walls. Only a complete militarization of political culture and Nation carries forward that logic: Hitler's "Strength Through Joy," a not-distant cousin. Win the people over, give them bread and circuses (chiefly rhetorical), crank up the machinery of patriotism, let the people think it is really their country, when in reality.... (Just look at the Cabinet appointments, and in the next few weeks and days, the roll back with a hatchet, not a scalpel, of social legislation.)

Here, the speech—dishonesty, flattery, a people's presidency: "rebuild our country and restore its promise for all of our people." (The trickle-down theory, with rouged cheeks.) The "orderly and peaceful transfer of power," heard ad nauseum on television, yet why not peaceful and orderly, given the continuity, my emphasis here on Obama, of bipartisan policy through administrations from at least Kennedy forward? More rightwing jive: "we are transferring power from Washington, D.C. and giving it back to you, the people." Again: "Washington flourished, but the people did not share in its wealth." A clever projection: demonize the source working hand-in-glove with plutocracy, the selfsame plutocracy Trump personifies, represents, and is determined to protect and enrich further. He speaks of "struggling families all across our land," yet is about to gut the programs making their lives bearable. This is like the Marquis de Sade politically: humiliate (the knife driven deeper by pseudo-praise) the victims of America's vast differentiations in the distribution of wealth, power, and social respect, and of course play up to those who have already evinced fascist sympathies (we are probably approaching the population half-way mark, including—shameful to say—a large number of working people).

The seeds of proto-fascism run deep, a contagion found in all classes, a shared responsibility in degradation and national shame. This is not the time to recite American history, present-day actions and attitudes tell the story, Trump being a useful summary of past and future. The USA "is your country.... [w]hat matters is...whether our government is controlled by the people." He captures the energy and momentum of the mass-man phenomenon: "You ['the forgotten men and women'] came by the tens of millions to become part of an historic movement, the likes of which the world has never seen before. At the center of this movement is a crucial conviction that a nation exists to serve its citizens." True, indeed, provided it is understood that some citizens—e.g., Morgan, Chase; Goldman, Sachs; Halliburton; Boeing, etc. etc.—are more equal than others. For Trump to have come this far, and not be laughed/booed off the platform, speaks volumes about where the nation is at: in a moral sociopolitical void.

“A righteous people and a righteous public,” collective self-flattery again, leads to the theme of Solidarity, classic fascist rhetoric, when he proclaims, “This American carnage [poverty, drugs, poor education] stops right here and stops right now. We are one nation.... We share one heart, one home, and one glorious destiny.” In other words, Don’t rock the boat, don’t criticize, stand united against the Outsider, whether within or without American society. No longer shall we have “the very sad depletion of our military.” [The New York Times here interpolates the surprising, for it, comment]: “The Pentagon spends about $600 billion a year on the American military, more than is spent on the next six largest world militaries combined. Hardly a depleted force.”

There is more, worthy of Brecht’s Arturo Ui, Mel Brooks’s The Producers, or run-of-the-mill Hitlerian dialogue: “From this day forward, a new vision will govern our land. From this day forward, it’s going to be only America first. America first.” Those of my generation shudder at the phrase (even as a small child on the eve of World War II), its crystal-clear Nazi overtones and associations historically realized in practice, and now brought back to life. Then into an American Paean: We will be self-sufficient. We will rebuild America. “We will shine for everyone to follow.” The city on a hill has never had a greater champion, oozing with ethnocentrism and xenophobia, not to say, organized within an authoritarian framework. The best he can do, and we can turn now from the speech, is: “We must speak our minds openly, debate our disagreements honestly [in both cases, not only massive surveillance, but also the Espionage Act to be used against whistleblowers], but always pursue solidarity.” Promises are meant to be fulfilled, or broken, but there is no getting around the last thought, “the pursuit of solidarity,” no fudging the fascist mindset.

My title mentions the banana republic (Webster’s, “a small dependent country; esp. one run despotically”), the last part square on the mark, but this is more serious: concentrated power to antisocial, antihuman ends, led by the unscrupulous and wealth- and power-hungry, a matrix of nihilism given a touch of glamor. Trump is for real. Militarism is for real, given special meaning and intensity by virtue of being inscribed within a fortress-like structure and mentality. Heaven help any who dare cross the United States of America.

JANUARY 24, 2017

Women’s March: Halt at the Water’s Edge

The celebratory mood is over, or rather, deserves to be; it was misguided in the first place because cultural/gender politics trivializes the foundational repression of advanced capitalism, that which gives to such repression the discriminatory content and practices necessarily to be opposed if the society has any claim to being a democracy. Of course, the March was crucially important both in exposing historical abuse (measured in centuries) and shattering illusions of apathy and/or consensus in American society in the new dispensation.

But what about the old dispensation? Trump is an excrescent feature of long-standing anti-humane, anti-radical politics and social values. He may be a convenient lightning rod for current problems affecting, e.g., wealth distribution, unemployment, and a shredded social-safety net, but every rotten (I use the term advisedly –Webster’s: putrid, morally corrupt) measure on war, intervention, regime change, and a domestic climate of fear, drawing inward, undifferentiated and neurotic hate, can be found in Trump’s predecessors, starting with Obama, and going back—with minor exceptions—to Truman and Kennedy.

Face it, America is a sick society, its chief symptoms a false consciousness and unreasoning reification of capitalism as The Absolute Good, enough, when filled out, to explain the disvalue and shortcomings of this past weekend's mobilization. The New York Times (NYT) had photos of the March in American cities and throughout the world. Placards shown therein give a solid indication of the parameters of the protest. Placards don't lie; they reveal and summarize innermost demands, and on the whole, they tended to disappoint if not anger this writer. To say, as so many did in identical wording, "Women's Rights = Human Rights," is a gratifying political tautology which says, however heartfelt and earnest, next to nothing, because failing—my "halt at the water's edge" in the subtitle—to designate the power context, political economy, ideological underpinnings, of the culprit responsible for the falsification of the equation of women's rights and human rights.

You may call it capitalism; or exceptionalism; or—and I would disagree—the distortion of an otherwise sound polity of justice. But labels are less important than understanding, and here, beyond a placard of my own, "Class Over Gender," in fighting both domestic repression and international criminality, I would ask, in this time of conflict, grief, and suffering, whether control over one's womb, gender identity, or cracking the glass ceiling, has greater significance than, e.g., putting a stop to Israelis herding Gazans into UN schools and blowing them up, or armed drones used for targeted assassination, or a worldwide network of military bases, poised to implement regime change, unilateral hegemony, or provocative confrontation with Russia and China? The list can be infinitely extended, so far has America slid down the slippery pole of crypto- (and perhaps soon to be fully actualized-) fascism.

Why, therefore, at the risk of total ostracism from a radical community (one in whose membership, though scattered, somewhat mythical, entirely variegated in its composition and demands I take pride in being included) would I choose to criticize The Woman's March, knowing full well its already iconic/sacred character, and how deeply meaningful to the participants? Good question, for which the answer, as I see it, would be: It stops short of essentials, it does not go far enough, it perhaps provides ersatz relief and creates the illusion of meaningful action, but at the same time stays safe, non-subversive, not striking at the sources of wealth, power, and militarism in America, and hence, changes little, is easily assimilable, in a word, cajolable, eating out of the same feed-bag that has given us Bush, Obama, Trump, miscreants of social injustice and totalitarian international politics.

We see the development from Banana Republic (my recent CounterPunch article) to, happening right before us, Rogue State (Webster's, succinctly, adj., vicious, destructive, applied to animals), a societal process of grinding out a position of counterrevolution in all things, not least, determined opposition to, and contempt for, a doctrine of human rights which, beyond pertaining specifically to women, mobilizes, now necessarily on class terms (if that were only possible!) on behalf of fundamental equalitarianism for all human beings, achieved, again necessarily, through the democratization of social structure. What good, e.g., is gender equality (Hillary in the White House) if the social order is functionally diseased with mass poverty, authoritarian habits of deference, a positive inclination toward war, both for assisting or making possible the profitability of capitalism, and for boosting psychological confidence and well-being to compensate for an inner core of separateness, one from another, and selfishness.

Alienation makes possible false consciousness, here, an inability to generalize and then bring to fruition the more meaningful equation, democracy = humanity, both predicated on structures which do not foster domination and repression, whether political, economic, or ideological (America ranking high on each, and maybe in that order). ‘Nuff said. I do not want to hurt the feelings of anyone involved in the March, and those at home and in other lands who identify with the marchers. Ideally, there is a rhythm to social protest, and that the weekend will lead to more. But by “more,” I mean greater substantive radicalization, and not simply further demonstrations. Transgender people suffer. Queers suffer. Gays and Lesbians suffer. The suffering is real, and is rooted in a society that cannot accept human equality and individuality.

Yet to get anywhere in the direction of a commonwealth of freedom requires looking beyond, while drawing anger and determination from, the viciousness and shabbiness of discrimination and getting down to the nitty-gritty of power, militarism, and hate. Besides, who would want cultural/gender rights if everything else about the society, from extreme wealth concentration to racism (which was not given proper attention in the March), remained the same?

JANUARY 25, 2017

Swastika: The Hillary-Donald Show

The inversion of Joe Hill: don’t mourn for me, ORGANIZE. Today, more perhaps than ever, the message is clear, timely, appropriate. America is tilting so far rightward as to pose a menace to global peace. This is not Trump’s doing alone; for over a half-century US near-unilateral world dominance was being actively constructed and implemented by both major parties, with comparatively little resistance from the body politic. The Great Celebration is finally coming to an end, an international context of political-structural-economic decentralization as Russia, China, and the Third World have come into their own, nullifying America’s hegemonic claims to moral certainty and superiority.

Hence, the nervous display of ethnocentric-xenophobic power, Behemoth not giving up lightly, although the national image of Fortress America, aka, America First, strikes a responsive chord and formula for electoral success. The choice of living in the world or dominating it is painful to the largest military power in history, backed by a nuclear arsenal second to none, and fed all these years a constant diet of war, intervention, regime change, in sum, counterrevolution to hold all factors constant pertaining to American power and might—painful, but apparently, business as usual, against accommodation, the collective decision reached.

Trump works fast, prepared to shove cabinet appointments through, asserting through executive action a significant modification of trade policy, setting a tone of ultra-nationalism, but in the long wash hardly a departure from his predecessors on final goals: alternative routes to monopoly capital, the routes themselves predicated on a disposition to autarky and military strength. He works fast, yet, on close inspection, this is because the foundation for global supremacy, affording him this freedom of action, had been laid by those who came before: an unrelieved sameness of integrated domestic and foreign policy holding the world structure hostage to America’s intentions.

Wealth, whether national or individual, recognizes its own—similarly, power. When Monday (Jan. 23) labor leaders tramped to the White House, groveling at Trump’s feet, we saw the logical consequences of a movement that had lost its will, drive, and historical role as a progressive social force, accepting crumbs from the table of plutocracy. Shocking? No, because by-and-large affiliated with the Democratic party, labor had negated and denied its class identity and position. There are no Joe Hills or Wobblies today, more likely, instead, war hawks who seek a larger share of the war pie, itself steadily enlarged to fulfill a supposed Imperial Destiny. Clinton, meanwhile, is Trump in pants suit, even more militaristic than he, banking on a nebulous tradition of social reform to carry forward a belligerence in reclaiming international leadership to the setback of the world masses.

Poor Hillary, she has had ample role models drawn from both parties—not an independent bone in her body—in shaping her outlook. Yet, given the shrunken ideological spectrum, in which a valid Left either doesn't exist or is negligible, she is currently hailed as a heroic figure wrongfully denied the presidency. If she had won, TPP and NAFTA would have gone forward, still not as the authentic democratization of capitalism, but the liberal (i.e., co-partnership of business and government, with heavy emphasis on the military) mode of wealth concentration. This liberalism is first and foremost antiradical, with national chauvinism running a close second easily channeled into uncritical patriotism.

Obama is now celebrated as a world-shaking democratic leader (this week's New Yorker lead by George Packer), a willful distortion of truth to disguise—because he is black(?)—a core posture of Reaction and the bloodless invocation of violence. He is standard operating procedure in the formulation and conduct of policy. Neither Clinton nor Trump questioned drone assassination or the suppression of dissent at home, both confident their positions would find favor or go unnoticed. Cursedly, they were right, just as policies of rendition and torture do not draw criticism, and whistleblowers are threatened with jail. Rather than take each President in turn, beginning with Truman through the likes of Kennedy, Johnson, Reagan, Bill Clinton, and the two Bushes, it is sufficient to note that continuities in foreign policy have received acceptance and accolades as the mark of wise statesmanship, as domestic policy meanwhile unrelievedly and steadily contributed to the maldistribution of wealth, spoliation of the environment, solipsistic human relations, an ethos of greed, a mindset of nirvana-like splendor and self-righteousness.

The ecstasy of Vietnam, the state of rapture in bringing crushing death to a near-helpless people, who, in fighting back, merely intensified the hatred shown them, typifies the mid-point of where we are at as a nation. Donald and Lyndon are not that far apart (if at all), a Republican and a Democrat, nor are Kennedy and Hillary, in this case, both Democrats. Nor Harry and Reagan, both specialists in Cold War intervention, again from presumably rival parties. There is plenty of ecstasy to go around, and more to come, whichever party is in power. Fortress America is not a gated community in macrocosm. The gates will stand open for the armies marching out, as the military budget threatens to dwarf all else. Civil liberties, already a casualty (did, from the start, the Democrats put up effective opposition to McCarthyism?), can only look forward to further deprivation and suspicion.

Am I too pessimistic? I can only say, prove me wrong—before it is too late. And of course, not me, but it will take tens of millions to turn the situation around. I fear that will not happen, the poisons of a false consciousness, Nazified in tenor, having become sunk too deeply over time in the American psyche. Bill, Hillary, and Barack made Trump possible by happily engaging in the process of continuity—conduct expected of Republicans, but not (although it should have been) expected of Democrats.

JANUARY 26, 2017

Backfire: US and the World

Backfire, Webster's: To have the reverse of the desired or expected effect (more familiar today, blowback, as used by Chalmers Johnson)—either way, America in a condition of overreach, an exaggerated, compulsive hegemonic demiurge, two centuries in the making and still counting.

It can't be helped. Capitalism plays mean tricks on society, integrally, when its commodity structure gives rise to alienation (Marx's Economic-Philosophical Manuscripts of 1844), and its growth imperatives give rise to imperialism, war, intervention, and social control-manipulation at home. So already, America is, in the long run, in trouble. But since the end of World War II, America has gone out of its way to court trouble and danger, to itself and the rest of the world, because of its unreasoning desire to prove itself, accelerate its power, and become the model, ideologically and structurally, for other countries, particularly those having alternative systems, to follow.

The obvious point of conflict is Russia and China, deemed perennial (if not also permanent) adversaries, a needed psychological construct to keep international politics at a boil, a war-dependent economy functioning (aka, acceptable rates of economic growth), and domestically, thoroughgoing indoctrination and regimentation with an eye to acceptance of and complicity in the values and practices of society's upper groups, themselves further differentiated into ultra-wealthy and wealthy, in command of politics, economics, and the military. Capitalism via the concentration of wealth is a class-system, and would not, despite the rhetoric of classlessness, have it otherwise. System, ideology, power, assertive leadership and acquiescent populace, in combination, even singly (though they tend to cluster), add up, fused and carried, as here, to extreme lengths, to FASCISM, incipient or full-blown, a distinction becoming less meaningful as, daily, one is evolving into the other.

Trump is only a pale replica of der Fuehrer, America's 21st-century version, so that fascism remains at a policy-stage of plutocracy and autarchy corresponding to the development of the political economy, not, at least yet, a rigid totalitarian state of concentration-camp dimensions. This does not mean that he is harmless, just as those leading up to his presidency are also not harmless, but only that the antecedent factor, capitalism with its myriad systemic requirements and traits, is the birthing context for arbitrary and aggressive rule. Here Trump is off to a good start; as I write, the focus turns from the Cold War as it presently exists to hemispheric affairs, relations with Mexico and Canada. Less significant in its own right, these relations indicate the backfire I noted, in which an Empire straining with every weapon at its command nonetheless is about to take a fall, in prestige if not still in power.

Authorization of The Wall (and its proposed method of payment, exclusively by Mexico) is sheer stupidity, among other things, counterproductive from the standpoint of advanced capitalism, and accompanied by threats regarding outsourcing and tariff penalties for reentry of US firms' products, a disaster in the making. NAFTA may be thrown out in response, and, starting a chain-reaction, affect American-Canadian relations (including Keystone XL) as well. Once the questioning of dominance in its own neighborhood begins, the boa-constrictor hold of the US in its immediate surroundings sends a clear message to others throughout the world that America is slipping badly, and that all the king's horses and all the king's nuclear armaments, standing army, military bases, targeted assassination, doctrine of permanent war, cannot put Humpty-Dumpty together again.

The seeming minor blip on the radar screen with respect to Mexico carries the hope, at least to me, that America has to reshape its global posture fundamentally, or face ostracism, disrepute, and worse still, loss of markets and claims to unilateral world leadership. Ideology is like the falling-domino theory: the pervasive fear that give an inch, and the whole game-plan collapses. At the moment, Great-Power relations may be at a temporary standstill, but it is the other, the less powerful, not calculated initially to cause problems, that might bring Goliath down to size in a world appreciative of just that outcome, and hence, willing, in bandwagon effect, to work to that end. If there is rhyme and reason in the universe, bullying does not always win out.

Mexico, judging from preliminary reports, is ready for comprehensive negotiations on its own terms, rather than the one-sided ones proposed by Trump. But Canada is equally exciting to watch, in spite of Trudeau's feet stuck in Alberta tar sands and his disappointing appeasement of American capital. If Mexico gains substantive political and economic grounds for itself, then Canada, with or without Trudeau, is not far behind, as though a giant pincer-movement would put the squeeze on the US. If that were to happen, a wall South, a wall North, metaphorically if not actually, we would see a drastic change in international politics, either with ramifications affecting relations with China and Russia or, as sore losers, America's resort to the nuclear option.

Trump's luxury properties worldwide might give him reason to pause (one of the redeeming qualities about wealth is the tenacious desire—the obsession—to hold on to it and think twice about the conditions for its destruction), so that he is not quite the true believer—in anything. But don't hold your breath. America cannot face its own decline, and will do what is necessary to avoid it. It would be ironic if, not the rising centers of power (China and Russia), but those which have been under America's thumb, bring about its comparative downfall, an unintended consequence of the US geopolitical framework—not just ironic, but altogether moral and right.

Then and only then can America live honorably within the Family of Nations.

JANUARY 27, 2017

Mexico and International Politics: Autarkic Walls

Trump wants absolute sovereignty (autarchy), not to hide behind, but to step forward (still further) into the world: the world an American colony or fiefdom, brought about through extreme militarism (is there any other form?) for purposes of political-ideological dominance AND internal social control. Herr Trump is our designated Nazi, in a business suit (preferably blue, with orange tie) than a uniform, armband, leather accessories. Berchtesgaden has been moved to Palm Beach. Membership in the Club is now doubled (fee, $200,000) to ensure the right sort of (billionaire) folk.

That bad, with four and possibly eight years still to go (assuming the Constitution remains still in effect), after a lightning first week of inflicting what appears to be permanent damage on policy, attitudes, the very processes of government? Move quickly, Donald, create a blur of activity, and a willing populace will nod itself to sleep, as, despite the Washington March, it appears already to be doing. America is comfortable with fascism. It resonates well with its core components, a militarization of political consciousness matched by the ever-widening differences in wealth and power. No problem about intra- and inter-capitalist struggles—the preponderant 1/10th of one percent already on your side, some of whom recruited into high government circles.

The case of Mexico is intriguing, a case study of the authoritarian mind. One does not build a 2,000 mile wall to shut down and humble a neighbor unless one is mentally (pathologically) unstuck—or is expressing the underlying wishes of the society one represents, which comes to the same thing. Mexico might as well be a mangy dog, given the message being sent out to it and the world. For Trump is looking beyond, while simultaneously addressing, Mexico. Proximity is only one matter, hegemony the more overriding concern. The fulcrum for establishing Mexico's subordination to the US, and every Third World nation in the schematic which provides for a two-tiered division of the world, very few at the top, is trade, investment, one-sided market penetration and extraction of raw materials and natural resources.

America has a gargantuan appetite; that is what makes it great and, ideally, to be feared. With Trump, all semblance of pretense is dropped: power is meant to be exercised, in this case from behind massive protective walls (the tariff a functional equivalent of keeping immigrants out). Make America Great Again, Saviors of the World, and with that head-start, go after Russia (his attachment to Putin a temporary marriage of convenience) and, more in his cross-hairs, China. Trump doesn't flinch, a rottenness of pride keeping him overextended in the willingness to use force.

Here, Mexico is a demonstration of policy, a pin cushion to serve notice on the remainder of the globe: complete surrender, or face the consequences (including nuclear blackmail). And with Mexico safely in camp, Canada offers another attractive opportunity to demonstrate political muscle, Trudeau possibly less resistant than Pena Nieto, the Alberta mindset of environmental spoliation taking over the country. Step-by-step gobbling up of countries, largely through economic means, but with military aggression always an option and held in reserve, is the pattern now, from Trump's record and pronouncements, the wave of the future. Isolationism is a mask to cover aggrandizement; an active foreign policy hardly comports with the drawing inward he alleges.

Trump has his Gauleiters, his Goebbels, Goring, and Himmler whether as individuals throughout the appointments, or as each a composite of the three when the surface is scratched, all adept at, and fully in agreement with, waterboarding, sleep deprivation, and assorted tortures, Guantanamo as well as globally situated Black Sites if not refurbished then at least dusted off and ready for occupancy. This speaks to reciprocal intimidation, whetting the appetite of the sadist: what you can do to one, you can do to all captive to your wishes. Leniency is a disease. To show such to Mexico will give subversive ideas to others. Strength, and strength alone, is the name of the game.

America and Trump are locked into a power relationship with the world that affords the US no room for backing down, nor does it wish to. The projection of world domination, from Truman (or better yet, Kennedy) to current policy is remarkably continuous, little allowance for party differences, which in any case are grossly inflated, so that to be an American now practically ensures consensus, with even the Washington March noticeably lacking in fundamental criticism of foreign policy, race deprivations, or systemic (i.e., capitalist) integral practices of wealth concentration. A Trump would have no trouble handling this range and quality of protest, as in fact he didn't seem particularly anxious about. America is domesticated, ready for a Strong Leader, after being softened up for 2/3rds of a century along these lines at the hands of both political parties.

Paradoxically, as Mexico goes (and possibly also Canada), so goes America, the turning inward of CONTROLS over the people for the benefit of a system which itself is designed and intended for the security, prosperity, and well-being of an infinitesimally small ruling elite. Palm Beach beckons, a siren song sucking in, via lese majesty (for who will dare to oppose Sovereign Power), the working stiff, employed or unemployed, minority person, immigrant, or others (the list is growing), in the throes of false consciousness, while Tea Time is an occasion for the favored few to delight in the suffering they are causing far and wide. Palm Beach at Tea Time, ah, wonderful, good for the soul, of those certified to properly appreciate it. Perhaps at some point, Buchenwald is not far behind—for those not so-certified by whatever criteria the Trumps of this world choose to offer.

MY NYT Comment on Azam Ahmed's article, "As Trump Orders Wall, Mexico's President Considers Canceling U.S. Trip, (1-26), follows:

Pena Nieto is certainly correct in his reluctance to come to the US. Trump is an international bully, if not worse. Forget interpreting actions in terms of symbolism—actions are real, and here, in substance, fascistic, arrogant, inhumane, criminal.

It is embarrassing. No one prominent in US political life has come out in condemnation—bipartisan cowardice (or conviction, it doesn't matter, because so obviously ethnocentric and xenophobic on America's part). But why any surprise? Trump has been peddling hate-filled garbage, and Americans eat it up.

His first week in office, and already unmistakable evidence of totalitarianism—with no comparable outcry on the American side for Mexican anger and indignation. Pena Nieto should above all show resolve. This is very like the late 1930s. You could not do business with Hitler when he put pressure on Western Europe. Similarly, Trump must be resisted.

Otherwise, a process of domestic appeasement sets in—and there may be no stopping Trump's future policies. A wall is not a symbol, but a geopolitical statement. Insulting immigrants insults humanity.

There are no limits to how far this can go, in Trump's case—and now that of all Americans, from immigrants abroad to dissidents at home, McCarthyism quite likely in the offing.

The US has no-one to blame but itself. It elected the man, and his opponent had already shown latent tendencies in the same direction, with Russia and China a substitute for Mexico.

JANUARY 31, 2017

Reichstag 1938 / Washington 2017

We are all Muslims. Either that, or we shall be torn apart as a nation, given over to Trump-Republicans' vomit of hate for all that defines human rights and a free society. It gets worse by the minute, the immigration issue merely code for venting spleen on a whole range of issues intimately connected with America's loss of undisputed pre-eminence to define and exclusively benefit from the world system.

Always attack the most vulnerable, if what you seek is unlimited power and acting without restraint. This strong-man complex is grounded in fear, fear of self-discovery as one whose ego (one here referring to a collective ruling group and the millions under its sway) depends on the humiliation of others to confirm one's greatness. Yes, Let's Make America Great Again, muscle flexing to prove a superiority founded on force, exploitation, the ultimate crushing of all dissent.

That takes us to the present. America occupies a forward space in what I term a pre-fascist configuration, i.e., analogous to Germany in 1938, where institutions are being rapidly made over to prepare them for a totalitarian make-over, done in the name of legality and the zeitgeist of the People. Trump is no dumbbell, although his actions may strike one that way. The quick articulation of a plan is so reminiscent of the way Hitler moved on the eve of a full-throated Nazi order. The precipice beckons. Find a scapegoat, build on the imagery of the Sainted Folk whom only the Maximum Leader can keep safe and pure.

The Leader must have loyal accolades, henchman in suits, to a person enlisted to destroy the Old for a glorious future of the New. Strut your wares, whether the stage be a massive rally, drums rolling, or a Twitter account, messages cascading out, difficult to keep up with: Fascism via the high technology of mass dissemination intended gradually to wear down the resistance of a free press. The Leader, now having a direct line to the People (aka, Folk), becomes the voice, indeed, standard, of truth, reality, social identity itself—a never-ending process first of mental and subsequently physical subjugation. Even the military is downgraded (Bannon's ascendancy without warning), making it docile to the diktat of superhuman beings bending—if that were possible—the generals (of whom there are plenty in the inner circle) to their will.

When civilians out-militarize the military, as occurred under Nazism, you know the country is on a permanent warpath. Call it counterterrorism, but the last week has shown that its true nature is as the vehicle of a power grab, a vision of regimentation of the Folk the better to conduct a business system free from all challenges to its profits and power. God is being replaced by Capitalism as the Holy of Holies, a development not a stranger to the advent of Nazism, where behind Hitler stood an advanced stage of corporatism (advanced for its time, as capitalist consolidation, particularly the financial sector, has leapt far beyond what was thought possible in 1938).

Trump's reorganization of government priorities and even structure bears clear resemblance to the Big Lie technique, be out in the open, confident, repetitive, ignore shadings, stay on message, attack always, rather than defend, never falter, lest that be interpreted as weakness. With a phalanx of billionaires behind you, and you yourself in their company, there is little to fear from outside criticism or the soon-to-be-created rabble bearing the brunt of your policies. 1938, 2017: hierarchy is in fashion, worse still, systemic. This means not only class stratification but also the basis for judging those in disrepute (beginning with the poor) inferior, an argument slipping easily into a eugenics broadside taking in ever larger numbers. Hitler understood: inferiority, so charged, is meant to be expansive and elastic, in time roping in all opponents, dissenters, those insufficiently patriotic.

Protest over the weekend at airports and public spaces is welcome and heartening; it reveals that totalitarianism is not complete. But I am waiting for the crackdown, which, judging from the present pace of events, is not far behind.

FEBRUARY 1, 2017

Curtain Descending: Fascistization of America

When does a qualitative change occur in the course of a nation's history, particularly when traces of the New appear steadily and throughout in the Old? Gradualism is deceptive. We conveniently think, e.g., of the Nazi Revolution, when in Germany, especially its Bismarckian side, exhibited an authoritarian bent that led to the cartelization of capitalism, from which internal hierarchy poisoned—from a democratic standpoint—social structure, ideology, political values, the people ground down into a uniform massive congealment of consciousness. The folk, its mystical antecedents in the distant past (Wagner's creative energies did not arise in a vacuum), enveloped in fog, created a disposition to mythologize, under strong leadership, its mission in the world. Enter Hitler. If he didn't exist, he would have had to be invented.

But he did, and the 20th century would never be the same. Weimar was part holding action, part churning out the social forces of the future (despite its astonishing gifts in literature, painting, architecture, etc.). Creativity is not a sure sign of democracy. Primordial structure and political economy roll again, perverting and taking hostage of whatever they touch, everything in their grasp. Germany could not escape its destiny, nor transcend its past.

Nor could America, a lineal pattern of development founded on capitalism (the relative absence of feudalism, but the presence of plantation slavery, made over however to ensure that itself was an adjunct of capitalism) which denied from the outset the equitable distribution of wealth and power, and thus foretold a future, not unlike that of Germany: homogenization of thought feeding into its own self-serving mythology of exceptionalism and national greatness. Both the US and Germany had vital labor movements—consensus, for America, quite meaningless until following World War II, political consciousness in Germany always facing a tough uphill battle.

Analogies abound where they are not expected, the appearance (only!) of freedom in America. its at best adulterated form in Germany. A convenient test of reality in this respect would be the prevalence of MILITARISM in the respective histories/political cultures, and here both pass with flying colors, America's the more deceptive (though just as accentuated) because aligned with a "free world" (aka, entrepreneurial) mindset. Among the world's most uncomplicated and intensive capitalistic formations—what I term its purist foundations—the US, one notes, provides the ideal social laboratory for testing the salience of capitalism, whether as alienation or the consolidation of industry and banking, or, a proclivity to military advancement.

One can perhaps only guess the reasons for the historical and societal alignment of capitalism and militarism, but if not divinely attributable it is possible to trace their close relationship to a demiurge of profit maximization, intracapitalist rivalry, and, since 1917, the fear of socialism. On these counts alone, even subtracting for cultural differences, America and Germany are not that far apart. But let's leave Germany, and focus on America. (Japan, in its own way, would duplicate some of the features of the other two, particularly the genesis and mode of industrial organization.)

These preliminary observations are a way of saying, America today, under Trump, is not something new to its own internal history. We demonize Trump, when in reality he stands on the shoulders of American presidents, their parties, their policies, and their practices—in sum, government itself—going back in recognizable form to McKinley (Open Door), T. Roosevelt (battleship navy), and Wilson (liberal internationalism, i.e., antiradical global stabilization). To experience qualitative change, which I think Trump does bring on, because of its visibility and overtness, does not make light of the past, simply acknowledges the accretive details as making possible the turning of a corner long in the making. Trump is the face of capitalism approaching its undisguised capacity for inflicting harm. As a total social system we can expect more Trumps down the road, provided not interrupted by a nuclear holocaust.

The firing last night of the acting AG, the invitation to dissident State personnel to get lost, the obduracy on the immigration issue, the plutocratic underside of federal appointments, these are but straws in the wind. It can only get worse, and perhaps never better, as the Constitution becomes a freely interpreted document of political gangsterism and hatred for the “softness” of human rights. Capitalism has robbed Americans of compassion. The present crew will have it its own way, because the polity knows of no other way than showing deference to the sources of power, an elite structure combining capitalism and the state, the latter organized first and foremost to expanding the advantages of the former. Trump brings back the Social Darwinian features of the earlier capitalism (circa 1880s-90s) while projecting forward its totalitarian attributes looking to a dystopian future of further concentration, manipulation of the people, and war-provoking tendencies.

We’ve already seen these characteristics in more attenuated form (although Vietnam certified the cruelty and go-for-broke mental set energizing the momentum forward). Those looking back years from now may see in Trump the moderate or liberal fascist, so terrible what is yet, or maybe yet, to follow in his wake. All bets are now off. Let’s hear it for torture, for stripping the social safety net of significant protections, for a world of conflict (an ingrained doctrine of permanent war already on the table thanks to Obama, as a transitional figure), and for Fortress America solidified, thrown back on itself, when it becomes clear to the leadership in business and government that undisputed world dominance is no longer within reach. Plow on, Ship of State; take pride in the consistency of American capitalist development.

FEBRUARY 3, 2017

Inflammatory Reaction: America Veers Right

Gorsuch’s nomination is merely an item in Trump’s remaking of the American polity in a fascist direction. This is not traditional conservatism. The fuller picture thus far is akin to a coup d’etat hiding under the name of the Constitution, Gorsuch actually less objectionable than, although perfectly consistent with, the rapid makeover of whatever vestiges remain of a democratic social order. Trump, with his foreign policy pronouncements, Cabinet selections, intimidatory, in-your-face treatment of those who disagree with him, is not merely a heavy-handed bull in a china shop, but a menace moving nation and world alike to the glorification of force, conflict, ultimately the breakdown and destruction of hard-earned human respect in modern history.

Wherever one turns, not a moment’s respite, America’s future grows darker. Bannon, Spicer, Kushner, central casting could not come up with more evil background figures, again, tip-of-the-iceberg for the underlying structure of government and society now emerging. Years are telescoped into weeks and days, a juggernaut of compressed hatred for an interpretation of human rights grounded in equalitarian belief and practice. Instead, the valuing of repression, as in hardened attitudes to, and solutions for, immigration, the social safety net, religious toleration, characterizes a prideful consistency in defying respect for the values of justice and freedom.

The wellsprings of fascism have been tapped, a fountainhead of elitism, contaminated patriotism, self-righteous justification of class and wealth, all springing forth to liberate an underlying militarism which structuralizes hierarchy at home and globally signaling the rightful ascendance of ruling groups bound together by common understanding of—it is hard to say what, beyond their own self-interest, but surely authoritarianism drives them and explains their rise. Trump, if not yet Hitler, is Mussolini in a blue suit and tie, demagogic, ready and waiting to give orders, stage events, a one-man version of shock and awe, who thus far shows a degree of reticence compared with what he is capable of: nonstop churning out of edicts and tweets which become a substitute for government, hence, one-man rule (guided by sinister figures in the background, of whom he has chosen to listen to, rather than being manipulated by) in disregard of constitutional restraints. The State, c'est moi, is a landmark already passed, in the modernization of divine rule.

But why mumble about the obvious, the bold contours of a dangerous regime now in power, when it is the minute-by-minute actions that are the most telling. Firing Sally Yates is another small sign of things to come, as is each and every designee for a cabinet post, all part of ripping up democracy at its roots and starting over with the use of government against rather than for the people. Public education? Ha. Health care? Ha. Peace? Ha, to the nth power. Arrestment of climate change and environmental degradation? The litany goes on, as though the hatred and contempt for social decency have been turned on against America itself. For what is left to despoil and destroy, all for a sterile, atrophied capitalism?

Yes, capitalism, surmounting nation-state identity, has become the driving ideological force, not the elephant in the room, the room itself, which admits of no criticism. Trump is single-minded here; he knows no greater god to serve, unless it be war itself still in the service of capitalism. This is not an abstract devotion to a system, but a command structure for the rightful leaders, with commensurate rewards for their leadership. And America, as the flagship of world capitalism, entitles it to global leadership of the “free world,” no, the whole and only legitimate world. Legitimacy thrives on power, in his eyes, that of his associates and colleagues, and the millions of Americans satisfied and cheering him on. Trump has not lost his popularity. Fascism has been vindicated in the results of the election (although I would maintain, Clinton is traveling the same road at a slower pace).

In the final analysis, it is not Trump, it is the America that has put him in a position of power, that must concern us. Can it throw off the yoke of totalitarianism that makes a Trump viable? I don't mean, necessarily, revolution, but what is now beginning to happen, with more pointed demonstrations at airports and public buildings. Will Americans wake up to the present dangers of fascism? Or is it already too late? That comparatively less resistance than one would hope, particularly on the part of a Democratic party that is largely bluster before caving in, gives little grounds for hope. Fascism is neither a pleasant word, nor state of society, but signals coming out of Washington are more than threshold noise; they confirm the real thing.

Update: Galloping Fascism

Fascism is a volatile political force. Once it has made inroads in society, it no longer crawls, but very quickly starts to gallop, feeding on itself like so many parasites hungry for contamination and power. America has just passed the take-off point, after several decades of big-business favoritism, environmental indifference, and worse—an interventionist foreign policy adopting a hard-line confrontational approach to Russia and China and ruthless military and economic treatment of Left governments while showing favoritism to Right dictatorship. All of this is a matter of long-standing record, which only the American public (blind to US unilateralism devoted to the expansion of its hegemonic capitalism) refuses to see or admit.

But now, things have gotten worse, enough so as to elicit varying responses of protest, none—as witness the Democratic party—sufficiently fundamental to address serious concerns about the totalitarian implications, both of American policy at home, a unitary package of corporatist organization, wealth concentration, and massive surveillance, and abroad, a monolithic stance of global imperialism, and the willingness to surrender democratic values in exchange for the comfort and security of strong leadership. A voluntary compliance of large numbers in fascism proper should, yet does not, seem evident. Let's start with Rex Tillerson's confirmation as Secretary of State, since the part above was written, the leadership principle, beloved by Nazism as epitomizing hierarchy, power, and the expected deference of the people, in which a leading business executive, with no experience in government (just as well), and head of the gargantuan and politically sensitive OIL company with a notorious record of foreign-affairs involvement, is presumably to guide policy in this area. I say "presumably," because Trump gives every indication of being personally committed to a Fortress-America position with grave counterrevolutionary consequences. Together, Tillerson and Trump will redefine what is permissible to discuss and act upon in foreign policy, Trump of course taking the lead. With no stone unturned in advancing capitalist interests.

As Gardner Harris writes in The New York Times (Feb. 1), the confirmation comes "just as serious strains have emerged with important international allies." Tillerson's appointment will not lessen the strains (mine), given his experience and narrow concern with business (and his reported six-continent dealmaking). To the politics of oil, add unilateralism and an even stronger presence in the Middle East. One problem he faces is Iran, to which the Trump people (e.g., Flynn) have already shown great hostility. Harris writes that Tillerson "struck deals with repressive governments—in at least one case, against the advice of the State Department. Environmentalists largely opposed his nomination." And then we have the refugee and immigration problems; it is unlikely he will stand up to Trump on these, nor that he would want to. It only gets worse, given Trump's ultra-nationalism, as in relations with Mexico, and his views toward the EU and, increasingly, Merkel and Germany. Fortress America and America First are reciprocally entwined, Trump's jingoism a natural seedbed for fascism.

Trump is not about politics-as-usual; he acts without constitutional restraint and with complete cynicism, knowing his opponents have not the heart to fight him (in Congress, on procedural grounds, in public, generally confined to single issues, with everything from race to foreign policy conspicuously absent). Long-term practices and guidelines are meant to be trampled, as when he directly intervened with Congress advising the Senate to adopt the "nuclear option," i.e., lower the voting threshold for approving Gorsuch to the Supreme Court, Gorsuch stamped from the same cookie cutter as Tillerson and all the other Trump clones of vitriolic conservatism. At 49, Gorsuch will ensure a reactionary (read here, “originalist” Court for decades to come—part of Trump’s extreme makeover of a government that has already demonstrated its proto-fascist ways. For Gorsuch, abortion, euthanasia, other issues he has taken up, are code for a deeper-lying judicially retrograde philosophy not seen since Bork and going back to Stephen Field in the 19th century. The other cabinet appointments, such as DeVos, equally indicate a compulsion to destroy government in the assigned functions of their departments—a detestable lot of billionaires having no sympathy for or knowledge of working people, the poor, minorities of every description.

High-handed, usurpation-oriented, as a preview of things to come, Hatch, chair of the Senate Finance Committee, suspended the rules to approve Mnuchin and Price for Treasury and Health and Human Services, respectively, when Democrats stayed away, a preview of what to expect whenever Trump and Republicans’ absolute control is challenged. The net of ideological Reaction is spread wider and wider, from Bannon, provocateur par excellence, who is to be the public face (along with Trump) of ethnocentrism and xenophobia (his 1,000% Americanism as warrant for his contempt shown immigrants), a view of sovereignty carried to fascist heights, to—you name it, they are all coming out of the rat-infested woodwork. Bannon: “I am Thomas Cromwell in the court of the Tudors”—one who relishes and does not draw back from POWER.

And this is only Wednesday evening, well before publication date. I noted that Trump bears watching, on a minute-to-minute basis, not as though a wild man, but as dedicated (this now within reach) to a chaos of restructuring principles and values which will throw the American people into the waiting arms of a self-propelled, self-defined Strong Man we once in more innocent days called a dictator. For the present, before the veil is taken off, he is simply our POTUS.

FEBRUARY 6, 2017

The Golden Rule: Waterboard Trump

The centuries-old rule of a morally just society is the golden rule: “Do unto others as you would have them do unto you.” This is simple, direct, to be applied to individuals, and increasingly now, policymakers, when they are in jeopardy of invalidating its ethical underpinning for the meaning of peace, equity, and yes, democracy itself. Trump is off to a good start in its extreme violation, specifically on the issue at hand, where there is no wiggle room for escape. Either you believe in torture (waterboarding, in this case) or you do not—and by calling waterboarding a form of non-torture is hardly an escape hatch from moral opprobrium.

I turn to Matthew Rosenberg’s New York Times article (Feb. 3), “Haspel, Had Leading Role in Torture,” which reports on Gina Haspel’s elevation this past week to the No. 2 slot, as deputy director, of the CIA. He writes that in 2002 she “oversaw the torture of two terrorism suspects and later took part in an order to destroy videotapes documenting their brutal interrogations at a secret prison in Thailand.” (Unlike Watergate, this is one instance where the cover-up is not worse than the crime itself.) One of the detainees, Abu Zubaydah “was waterboarded 83 times in a single month, had his head repeatedly slammed into walls and endured other harsh methods before interrogators decided he had no useful information to provide.”

This IS America, the moral nation, now on its way to Greatness, and, by his general statements, and acceptance of Haspel to such a high post, Trump’s own predilections in the matter. Despite a presumed formal ban, torture is back in vogue, disguised as its opposite, in the desiderata of the administration, and just as presumably, in the offing, when the first opportunity is found, at one with hate-filled monstrosities of dystopian visions already present. It is not only I. who in articles in CP last week warned of where America is presently (with complicity of Democrats, in full enlistment), in the aggressive belligerence shown the world, but here is Francois Heisburg, a senior advisor to the French Foundation for Strategic Research, who said: “In the Trump world there are no sunny uplands, just darkness and hatred.”

Rosenberg points out the respect Haspel enjoys (knowing full well her record) in intelligence and government circles: “The elevation of Ms. Haspel, a veteran widely respected among her colleagues, ... was a rare public signal of how, under the Trump administration, the agency is being led by officials who appear to take a far kinder view of one of its darker chapters than their immediate predecessors.” This last was not for want of trying on the predecessors’ part, Obama never setting out to clean house at CIA, and those officials, like Clapper, who said he was “very pleased” with Haspel’s appointment, and Morell, “I applaud the appointment,” make clear as much. Thus, Rosenberg continues: “Over the past eight years, C.I.A. leaders defended dozens of agency personnel [i.e., under Obama] who had taken part in the now-banned torture program, even as they vowed [much to their consternation?—mine] never to resume the same harsh interrogation methods. But President Trump has said repeatedly that he thinks torture works.”

This is splendidly to the point, for it raises the question of the relationship between Obama and Trump. Banning torture was rather late in the day for the former, with no specific repudiations and disavowals, nor of course punishments (Obama enjoyed good relations with the CIA and the intelligence community, as in NSA’s campaign of surveillance at home, eavesdropping on foreign leaders, like Merkel, abroad). Too, how different in moral and functional equivalents is torture from Obama’s signature in counterterrorism, armed drones for targeted assassination? None that I could find, cementing both, in terms of legacies, as moral monsters. Could Trump, so early in his administration, have gotten away with this much, had not Obama provided the structure of foreign relations and contempt for the law—intervention, regime change, nuclear modernization, treatment of detainees, favoritism shown corporate wealth, all aspects of an interrelated framework of war-corporatism—that he did?

Trump, despite his earlier superficial criticism of CIA, gives away the show on essentials when he appointed Pompeo as the agency’s director, who, as the reporter notes, “has said that waterboarding and other techniques do not even constitute torture [how long the barrier remains?—mine], and praised as ‘patriots’ those who used such methods in the early days of the fight against Al Qaeda.” Where the Democrats here, laying down on the railroad tracks in silent submission? As for Haspel, “who would certainly fall within Mr. Pompeo’s description, [s]he played a direct role in the C.I.A.’s ‘extraordinary rendition program,’ under which captured militants were handed over to foreign governments and held at secret facilities, where they were tortured by agency personnel.” Much of her career was spent under Obama.

She ran the CIA’s “first overseas detention site in Thailand,” where Zubaydah was tortured, “the recordings stored in a safe” there until 2005, her “cable carrying the destruction orders”—the kind of footsie carried on by both Obama and Trump in the name of patriotism. Resistance to her promotion, comparative silence: Chris Anders, of the ACLU, was one of the few voices raised against her. Devin Nunes, chair of House Intelligence, quoted in Rosenberg, praised her as “the first woman to serve as deputy director and said that she had ‘impressed us with her dedication, forthrightness, and her deep commitment to the intelligence community.’ So much for the vile garbage emanating from Washington, an utterly corrupt system administered by both parties. Torture is presently against the law, for how long one can only speculate.

***

This raises the question, applicable to Trump and his predecessors (for he cannot be examined in a vacuum), of the connectivity in America of power, wealth, and fascism, possibly from the time of Truman onward, and certainly, from Reagan onward. I have said as much in previous CP articles, but this Haspel business drives home the point, of the darker side of US politics and government, and now, with the gathering of the clan of Billionaires under Trump, even less reason to think things will be different, from torture to the dismantlement of regulation with regard not only to corporate practice but also elementary safeguards to the nation’s health and well-being. America is fast crumbling into a boiling cauldron of hate, selfishness, and combativeness, Trump the perfect articulator, implementer, further executioner of capitalism in high spirits laboring almost gleefully under the aegis of Thanatos, an instinctual desire for death, taking on mythopoetic proportions in light of destructiveness already wrought on the world and in contemplation for the future.

FEBRUARY 7, 2017

Corporatism: Hemorrhaging of the Body Politic

Photo by SPACES Gallery | CC BY 2.0

Corporatism, a polite term for fascism, is specifically in my usage (not unlike what occurred in Germany, Italy, and Japan, 1925-38, before fully structuralized) the business system conjoined to the political order: a capitalist polity organized around the principle of hierarchy and a strong leadership ethos and form. Welcome to America 2017, historically a little behind the time, for strict comparative purposes, but an antecedent preparation and buildup fully up, via business-government interpenetration (with more recently a militaristic component), to the definition. As I've written before in these pages this is not the single-minded "achievement" of Trump, but summarizes ideological and systemic trends in America since the late 1800s, chiefly, borne out in the concentration of wealth and power, rapidly accelerating, on a bipartisan basis since 1945.

We are there now. Analytically, sometimes the microscopic level best helps to understand the macroscopic, in this case, Trump's meeting at the White House last Friday (2-3) with CEOs of various major corporations, the purpose, to assure them that regulations will be significantly reduced (already a step, when realized, far on the way to satisfying the meaning of fascism). The emphasis was on regulations affecting the financial system, itself a prioritization fraught with meaning about the nature and complexity of US capitalist development, a chosen pathway to the control of the world economy without force-feeding industrialism in gaining entrance to global markets. Fortress America behind high protective walls is an attractive paradigm for a campaign of imperialism, market penetration, the manipulation of commercial and monetary transactions efficiently and painlessly.

But here, finance, is also a convenience, for precedent created in one area, e.g., manufacturing, can be carried over into another, political economies interrelated on such matters when it comes to essentials. Capitalism is a system, not a congeries of loosely related emphases and/or entities and forces. We can expect, then, organic ties between the micro- and macro-levels, and in the White House Conference, Trump does not disappoint. One rock-bottom goal has been to deny (and therefore destroy) the fiduciary relationship (Webster's, founded on faith or trust) between advisor and client, fund and investor, system at large and the people, a free-range capitalism predicated on anything goes, restraints, both legal and ethical, taken off the table. (Among those chosen to attend, as in the auto industry, a deep sigh of relief could be seen, as Trump made his way around the conference table, shaking hands, slapping backs—a camaraderie among actual or soon-to-be realized billionaires and their associates.)

Rescinding much of Dodd-Frank goes to the point here, legislation not exactly drawn up by John Reed or Rosa Luxemburg, yet sufficiently feared, damned, and despised by Trump's cohort that its destruction was deemed mandatory to their support and his administration's record. This includes, as the implementation of drastically weakening Dodd-Frank, doing the same, with equal glee, to dismantling much if not all of the Consumers Financial Protection Board—Elizabeth Warren one of very few standing up to Trump's harsh tactics and bulldozing. If one wanted to put a name to a face, as executor (aka henchman), to this particular area of rollback it would be Gary Cohn, formerly of Goldman, Sachs, indicative of administration recruitment.

Trump has brought monopoly capital to mainstream America. Systemic political-economic hemorrhaging (Webster's, heavy or uncontrollable bleeding) concerns corporate deregulation, but also an aggressive foreign policy, despite Trump's protestations of informed isolationism, a stripped-down America, the welfare sector cut to the bone, freeing up resources for allocation directly to defense, yielding, it now appears from his Twitters, the regimentation of dissent as an end for its own sake as well, because of his ingrained authoritarianism and because an ideal setting for rolling back the social-welfare legislation of the past. FDR is stood on his head; the capitalist polity, more broadly, is meant to arrest history.

History in the popular mind ordinarily signifies progress, further, progressive democratization of institutions of privilege, wealth, and status. No longer. America feels itself surrounded, closed in (survivalist billionaires, with their remote bunkers, pillboxes, and mountain retreats, a sign of the times), tightly coiled, and ready to strike out, paranoia as part of national character, and not only confined to Trump fanatics. War is more thinkable, once bullying ceases to have effect, in the generality of society, lest capitalist ground rules are not universally adopted, a peculiarly American mission since at least the Open Door and increasingly difficult of achievement as mixed and third-world economies come on board. The world is less suited to America today than it was in 1950 or 1970 (and even up to 2000), as unilateralism is challenged, patently, by Russia and China, yet also by a host of historical actors seeking to overthrow the influence of neocolonialism and imperialism.

Trump is the ideal candidate for resistance to these forces, which is to say, ruthless, pigheaded, inept, provocatively loaded for battle in a contest that America, sure to lose, can bring the rest of the world down with it. To come full circle, does not extreme business-financial deregulation signify a nihilism, well beyond amoral cynicism, which throws fellow citizens under the bus of capitalism? Not a blush, not a tear; it had to be done if the system was or is to realize its full potential as a wealth-producing machine for the very rich. This is naked accumulation far exceeding the needs of a trickle-down theory or framework. It is more blunt: Get out of my way. That is why war is more thinkable today, if not inevitable.

FEBRUARY 17, 2017

Self-Devouring Reaction: Governmental Impasse

Photo by Shardayyy | CC BY 2.0

Fascism commends itself on its self-evidence (to its adherents) and its tidiness (making the trains run on time), a mental frame which harnesses the cult of action to a certitude of belief that translates into authoritarian submissiveness. How else explain what is happening in America today? We have billionaires floating around and in government who we did not know existed and who seemed pulled out of a rabbit's hole of gut-level extremism heretofore always present but under wraps waiting for its day in the sun.

We are still at sunrise, after a predawn setting, under Liberal/Democratic auspices, which already created the conditions for its breaking surface in a new day. There could not be Trump, if there were not, first, Obama, and there could not be Obama, if there were not first the continuity of predecessors, bipartisan, single-minded, dating back half-a-century. Trump is not happenstance; he is as American as apple pie.

Take for example his invitation to Stephen Feinberg to review United States intelligence agencies, with his possible appointment as director of one. An incestuous process at first glance, it is actually a still more rightward shift of mainstream government, with Republicans goading him on, and Democrats largely marginalized, shooting arrows at hardcore nutcakes ordinarily beneath contempt. Yet in present-day America, to be a billionaire is certification of competence, (nonexistent) prior public service, patriotism (the single word driving a state of false consciousness, and yes, America's own Nazification), and mood of hardening ideology.

Feinberg is the co-partner in Cerebus Management, a fund unerringly pointed in the direction of America's fascistic underpinnings, from heavy investment in defense industries to covert counterrevolutionary forces. That he and Trump would go public with such a record speaks volumes about the prideful assertion of what had once been publicly unsuitable and almost beyond the pale. But there he is in full display (as are the others around Trump: take your pick, Bannon?), no apologies, on the contrary, bulldozing straight ahead.

Once, from the standard of structural analysis, the interpenetration between business and government, a unification of two modern spheres of authority, capitalism and the state, was adequate to the definition, as found in late stages of Weimar, and corresponding stages in Japan and Italy. With internal regimentation and the outpouring of militaristic expansion, matched by, or even preceded by, the concentration camp and gas chamber, the definition was seen as too simple. That in fact history was in the throes of civilizational upheaval, capitalism a driving force, even within itself, of world conflict. (Neither Russia nor China has evinced the staying power to be a viable challenge in determining the global order.)

Under Trump, American world ascendance is proving catastrophic, a frenzied feeding in search of still greater power: America First, as our neo-Nazis of the late 30s would have understood and appreciated the phrase, has come to signify a solipsistic national universe, unilateral in its power surge, that, perhaps without need of the concentration camp, will produce the same result, passivity, marginality, of the people below. Trump, Feinberg, Mattis, Bannon, make even the CIA look good. The rehabilitation of Obama is rapidly underway, if that was ever in doubt. In sum, there is no governmental impasse, only the next step in the uphill slog to greater supremacy.

FEBRUARY 20, 2017

Fascistization Crashing Down: Driving the Cleaver into Social Welfare

Trump is Hitler with golden locks. Skip the polite discourse, this is the real thing. We've already seen in one short month what the future holds in store: the going after social decency as a nation with a vengeance, a gutting of all that signifies a democratic society and its possibilities.

Here let's focus on one segment of the record, the nitty-gritty of domestic humiliation and continued suffering of the poor. Mike Mulvaney, an obsessed, pathological cutter of social spending, was confirmed last Thursday as White House budget director (with little fight from the Democrats, a now familiar pattern, under Schumer, of compromise and complicity with the most retrograde forces seen in decades). Targeted for elimination right off the bat are the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, the Legal Services Corporation, AmeriCorps, and the National Endowment for the Arts and the Humanities—these for starters, and presumably symbolic to the Right of godless communism intended to brainwash America, and worse, detract from rising military budgets.

When one goes below the surface, to more gutting of social priorities, a naked Capitalist State is fast surfacing from the carnage, the rise of a narrowly based, hierarchical, billionaire-directed political order. This is not a nameless, undetected development, Stephen Miller, Paul Winfree, Peter Navarro, in addition to Mulvaney, all leading the charge in this one tight area. And that is but the tip of the iceberg—Black Shirts underneath pin-striped navy business suits. Cruelty is built-into the selection process, raw hatred of and contempt for the poor, such as the proposed scrapping of the Appalachian Regional Commission and the Neighborhood Reinvestment Corporation.

Fix upon the construction of a massive class state, precisely at a time when the world cries out for the eradication of poverty, misery, needless death, all following from current policy, by design, malicious to the extreme. Throw Peter Navarro into the mix, with the National Trade Council, and you find the bridge to Bannon and the nationalistic power-crazies making the Trump presidency a unified expression of fascism pure and simple, no redeeming features. The ax swings wide, such as destroying—despite protestations of antidrug policies—the Office of National Drug Control Policy. Cut, cut, cut, wherever sanity once reigned. All of this, as I noted, is simultaneous with the planned enlargement of the military—military foundations of a class order with dictatorial ambitions for shaping the global system.

Scapegoats follow. China is the new Russia, where anything goes for the sake of confrontation. Restricting imports is less for its own sake, whether with respect to China or elsewhere, than the mood of subservience to be inculcated into the populace under the leadership of an army of CEOs floating their corporate banners into the NEW DAY, one where every nation will fear an omnivorous, all-mighty United States of America. All hail mighty Caesar.

FEBRUARY 22, 2017

Mar-a-Lago, Ideological Refuge: Berchtesgaden, II

Sometimes symbolism rings a bell that straight non-fiction cannot, and where humor, as in Mel Brook's "The Producers," approaches the unmentionable and provides some sense of release or comfort. Such is the case here, Mar-a-Lago. Trump's Southern White House, in Palm Beach, is a veritable termitarium (a termites' nest) of extreme, and heretofore somewhat concealed, wealth that is now coming out of the woodwork.

We owe to Trump what Veblen, C. Wright Mills, and countless radical critics of America's class-and-power system, had not successfully revealed: the raw guts of oligarchy, with accompanying authoritarian values, always in process of formation and taking cohesive form by, say, the early 1950s, a period coinciding with commencement of the Cold War in earnest. (War, hot or cold, is an ideal setting for, and helps to reinforce, the process of wealth concentration.) This is not a matter of simple political confrontation at a particular stage of global imperialism.

Rather, America's ascendance occurs, of course, in the changing environment of world revolution, with Russia and China as vanguard socialist political economies (and Third World nations industrializing and seeking common ground) over what was and still is perceived as ideological differences (even with the evisceration of Russian and Chinese socialism). Instead of intracapitalist imperialism, in the aftermath of World War II America defined a new stage of imperialism through adopting a global counterrevolutionary posture, applicable to capitalism and socialism alike: a march against history itself. America was in the game of unilateral capitalist world dominance, itself in this process nothing less than pre-eminent, from the start and here on out.

Yet Mel Brooks notwithstanding, this is no laughing matter, indeed, just as Trump is not your garden-variety would-be dictator who surfaces every generation or so, as in a figure out of Sinclair Lewis or Robert Penn Warren. He is the genuine article, not only in his own right but what he brings to the table: haute capital, brazen, claiming its alleged due of decision-making rights, prescriptively tuned to war, aggression, hegemony.

Brooks's SS-lovelies, dancing in black leather (as seen in the overhead shot) in swastika formation, is a scene that is no match for reality, each announcement from Washington signaling the further dismantlement of democratic government, leaving the people vulnerable, unprotected, ripe for exploitation. The result, under the mantra of privatization as an absolute good (and token of liberty), is a Nazi polity in pseudo-Jeffersonian garb. That is, the announced purpose is to reduce, to the point of destruction, a viable public sector by cutting government—except for the military—to the bone.

Mar-a-Lago, both as symbol and fact, nicely summarizes where, with Trump's election, the nation is at. His election is not determinative per se, only that, because it happened, it reveals the state of mind which indicates the American predisposition to fascism. (What else could such an election signify, even rejecting Hillary Clinton, Cold Warrior, servant of Wall Street, par excellence, as insufficiently reactionary and no real match for Trump?)

Whether confirmatory, aspirational, or still latent, this fascistic identity, pushing outward now from domestic to foreign policy, has been a long-term trend beginning with the crystallization of industrial wealth, the gradual filling out of finance capitalism, and a more assertive foreign policy, all in the generation after the Civil War. By World War I and the attempted conquest of the Russian Revolution, The Donald could already be perceived in the distance, as only a matter of time.

Mar-a-Lago in itself is hardly new, a gathering place for industrial and financial wealth to be placed historically alongside Bar Harbor, White Sulphur Springs, and other enclaves, watering holes, etc., nor is it even now a centralized locus of wealth in America. It is not central HQ for a unified, necessarily tightly cohesive, ruling group, itself not having yet shaken down to such an outcome. But it is a microcosm of the future.

Currently, as in some examples given below, it reflects the middle stratum, members, guests, visitors, of extreme wealth and upper-class formation, those, mostly active, near the top of megapower, with cross-sectional flow of visitation rights and consanguineous relations directed to incorporating the American military into the power structure. Wealth concerns class dominance; its militarization concerns fascism.

I do not denigrate the majesty of haute capitalism in my focus here on the middle stratum of the top tier of societal wealth and power, for it is from these ranks that further cohesion and cementing of identity occurs. Trump embodies the structural process at work, and he has already entered the danger zone of, if not irreversible social change, then at least an accelerated trend toward a totalitarianism difficult by this point to dislodge. Meanwhile, Democrats (and radicals, as well) are left picking daisies in a field of dreams, dreams already being nudged rightward through decades-old pressures of Reaction.

Here I draw on an excellent article (so far as it goes) in The Times (2-19) by Nicholas Confessore, Maggie Haberman, and Eric Lipton, “A Look at Mar-a-Lago’s Members, With a Front-Row Seat to History,” the latter an unwitting testimony to the qualitative change occurring in America today, and still opposed by Democrats in conventional political terms, rather than, as needed, unceremonious opposition to the grave danger facing the Republic. Chuck Schumer may be cardboard opposition, to be steamrolled over just as were Hitler’s critics during Weimar and subsequently. He is not alone in this regard.

The scene is idyllic, Kushner, “by the beachside soft-service ice cream machine,” Bannon, “on the dining patio,” while Trump “could stop by your table for a quick chat.” However, “you will have to pay $200,000 for the privilege [of the chat]—and the few available spots are going fast.” Why the hefty entrance fee (not including annual dues)? Wealth attracts wealth and the window is opened, cocktails and dancing for assured background of worthiness and respectability, to one-on-one influence peddling (a phrase once derived from a slightly more innocent time, a hegemonic class structure not yet in place or getting there).

Yes, idyllic, free from riff-raff (aka radicals) where negotiation is only less important than the identity of the negotiators—a burgeoning class of Billionaires stamped essentially from the same mold and holding the same outlook. “Virtually overnight,” here Trump “has entertained a foreign head of state [PM Abe], health care industry executives and other presidential guests”—and this, only into the first four weeks of his presidency.

The reporters are not reticent in their description (plutocracy and conflict of interest are not mentioned explicitly but patently obvious): “Trump’s gatherings ... have also created an arena for potential political influence rarely seen in American history: a kind of Washington steakhouse on steroids, situated in a sunny playground of the rich and powerful, where members and their guests enjoy a level of access that could elude even the best-connected of lobbyists.”

In fact, we are beyond the level of lobbyists as though an unnecessary intermediate level, when, as the mark of the new cohesion forming at the top, wealth can talk face-to-face to itself, shorn of all sense of wrongdoing, sordidness, or illegality. Fascism is thereby made to appear respectable, the advantage of a common setting, in which the State and Capitalism have become integrated, and a mature site for the reception of the military factor as an essential component of the whole.

Who's around this past weekend, according to the news report? In addition to the retinue Trump has already gathered, an influential elite from family (nepotism?) and bureaucratic appointments (approved and prospective), there were undoubtedly present, drawn from "the club's nearly 500 paying members," an assortment that includes "dozens of real estate developers, Wall Street financiers, energy executives [a growing center of power and interest in the administration] and others whose businesses could be affected by [and could affect] Mr. Trump's policies."

This by itself does not constitute a ruling group, but centripetal forces are at work to winnow down the chaff (wannabe Trump developers) and provide through the consolidation process a strategic core of power-wielders, especially as from such decisive areas as defense and energy, capable of defining the makings of a ruling class attuned and inclined to the need and desirability for a fascist polity. I didn't call the roll, so some may have been elsewhere, but I note Koch, "who oversees a major mining and fuels company," and—a new one to me—"the billionaire trader Thomas Peterffy, who spent more than $8 million on political ads in 2012 warning of creeping socialism in America."

Then there is Janet Weiner, "part owner and chief financial officer of the Rockstar energy drink company, which has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars lobbying federal officials to avoid tighter regulations on its products." Nothing sinister here, just business as usual, a glimpse of which can be seen in the interview of Trump's son, Eric, who "rejected suggestions that his family was offering access to his father and profiting from it. First, he said, only 20 to 40 new members are admitted per year, and second, the wealthy business executives who frequent the club, among others, have many ways to communicate with the federal government if they want to."

Eric is right, for that is a useful description of the interpenetration of business and government, except that now two-way access is greatly facilitated, accelerated, and structuralized, already seen in the Trump presidency and its Cabinet selections (and Supreme Court nominee, a self-admitted junior Scalia), intentionally chosen to destroy the workings of the departments they will be administering. Conflicts of interest? Impossible in the new dispensation, for as Hope Hicks, a White House spokesperson, explains, "federal law exempts [the president] from provisions prohibiting federal employees from taking actions that could benefit themselves financially." POTUS, in sum, is above, or rather is, the law.

And like Eric, she, too, is right. Personal enrichment, for Trump, is small potatoes in a position such as this; for now he can dedicate himself to the ideological construction and defense of a systemic framework of wealth aggrandizement. (Opponents, regrettably, still focus more on his personal enrichment through worldwide holdings, than on the harm he can do in the transmogrification of the American polity.) This is not government as we once knew it; Mar-a-Lago is a private preserve of vested wealth: "But unlike the real White House, it has no public access, and no official visitor log is available." The press corps covering Trump "were housed during part of the trip in a room whose windows had been covered with black plastic."

Perhaps soon, the entire nation will be covered in black plastic. For the elite, which pretty much defines the membership, this does not apply, and a camaraderie prevails in which the president "might seek guidance on a major government project the way another New Yorker might ask around for a good orthopedist.” Such is the community of wealth and friendship drawing together. Berchtesgaden? I may exaggerate for now, but it may also be a matter of time before its full consummation. Fascism, American style, does not have to replicate the German model, accomplishing the internalization of restraint and obedience of society as a whole, instead, through other means, such as the projection of an enemy inside or outside the gates. What is certain is that democracy presently is not putting up much of a fight.

FEBRUARY 24, 2017

Drumbeat of Fascism: Find, Arrest, Deport

Tuesday (2-21-17) was a black day in US history, conflicted in a time sense, reverting back to the antiradical/anti-immigrant somewhat contrived and organized hysteria of A. Mitchell Palmer at the time of World War One (the notorious Red Raids), and projecting forward to recognizable systemic-psychological traits of authoritarianism enveloped by and serving to define a receptive political culture, long-standing historically and now rapidly maturing in form and more lethal in content. You ain’t seen nothing yet. The foregoing dynamic is only seemingly conflicted. Faced in both directions America in fact expresses a unity or unitary historical-structural development, focused on pre-eminence in the capitalist world, counterrevolution as to the remainder. What has changed over time is America’s greater omnipotence, as military complement industrial, financial, and commercial factors at the expense—given its unilateralism—of other capitalist, socialist, and Third World political economies.

The immigrant is the convenient, easily recognizable target for the remaking of America. It does not require Freud to see the psychodynamics at play here, a generic scapegoat which validates the idea and reality of internal societal division, itself corresponding to hierarchical class-and-power arrangements in the context of interpenetrated frameworks of business and government and the concentration of wealth. What you can do to the immigrant you can do to everyone else, a metaphorical framework of the mind in which leverage is created for achieving separation in all things where ethnocentrism and xenophobia reign. He/she is all of us, absent government, capitalist, military elites who to some degree owe their differentiation from the populace because of the psychodynamics: no greater example of respect for wealth, power, and status than the American, objectively light years outside of ruling circles because of a false consciousness grounded in the workings of capitalist alienation. Upper groups have long won the ideological battle of social legitimacy.

Elites, in a unitary structural paradigm, do not as a rule inhabit separate universes of activity, and rather, as now, gain greater coherence (both as structures—political, economic, social—merge at the top, and common patterns of belief emerge) as a new ruling group, or better, ruling class with demonstrably fascist proclivities. Cutting to the chase, I have in mind by way of explanation the excellent New York Times article by Michael Shear and Ron Nixon, “Trump Details Plans to Deport Millions of Immigrants” (2-21), which, because so neutrally-worded, is the more powerful—if unintended—indictment of current thinking and future action. Trump was not the product of a coup; he had, and still has, significant support at home to indicate that what The Times describes reveals a degree of public complicity on the immigration issue (the article had a second title inside the paper, “New Trump Deportation Rules Allow Far More Expulsions”) which, as “expulsion” implies, is anything but democratic.

The reporters’ opening sentence says it all: “President Trump has directed his administration to enforce the nation’s immigration laws more aggressively, unleashing the full force of the federal government to find, arrest and deport those in the country illegally, regardless of whether they have committed serious crimes.” Right off the bat we find that aggressive enforcement shall be more inclusive of coverage (any pretext will do, like minor infractions of the law, to start the deportation process) and punitive in execution. As for the full force of the federal government, this makes viable—integral to the machinery and spirit of enforcement—a trickle-down fabric of authority, in which state and local government units are directly involved in the overall process (extremely important, as cities declare themselves sanctuaries, greater opportunities for conflict arise, and the manifest injustice of the policy is recognized). But more, deportation/expulsion does not hinge on the seriousness of the alleged offense, and already there is discussion that no offense is necessary if the official sees or claims to see a threat to public safety.

The sentence which follows in the article fairly bursts with the entertainment of fascist thought on a sweeping basis: “Documents released on Tuesday [2-21] by the Department of Homeland Security revealed the broad scope of the president’s ambitions: to publicize crimes by undocumented immigrants; strip such immigrants of privacy protections; enlist local police officers as enforcers; erect new detention facilities; discourage asylum seekers; and, ultimately, speed up deportations.” Ordinarily, verbatim quotations are not necessary (the reader can go to the source himself/herself), but this succinct summary, itself only scratching the surface, is useful in showing how vulnerable the individual has become, and institutions falsified and/or prostituted in the process. Cast the immigrant in a pejorative light, deny privacy considerations and, really, the rule of law to the immigrant, and to me most chilling of all for what it portends, rising reference to detention centers (already figuring in the budgetary plans). And of course, build a self-willed Iron Wall or Curtain to exclude asylum seekers and speed up deportations, here and above a collective schema verging on fascism.

So much of the Trump Phenomenon was clearly communicated to the American electorate, thus affording little opportunity for passing the buck. The US, on the part of both major party’s candidates, signaled substantial agreement on suppression at home, hegemony abroad, with Trump the more articulate (and less politic) of the two, as when in the campaign he treated immigrants as “criminal aliens” and projected fears of rapists as gathering at the border for indiscriminate and horrific home invasion. The climate of repression, coming so early in the functioning of the departments and agencies and the administration itself, a warning of what to expect, can be seen in the statement of John Kelly, secretary of homeland security (quoted by the reporters), “The faithful execution of our immigration laws is best achieved by using all these statutory authorities to the greatest extent practicable. Accordingly, department personnel shall make full use of these authorities.” Aside from the military slant Kelly brings to DHS, what we are seeing already is the increasing prominence accorded to the department, thereby keeping the immigrant at the forefront of the policy context and what that means for publicly-sanctioned nativism and authoritarianism.

Spicer, White House press secretary, noting that Trump wanted to “take the shackles off” the immigration authorities, stated on the 21st that among the new policies “the No. 1 priority is that people who pose a threat to our country are immediately dealt with,” now the immigrant, but who knows what next. Inculcating fear and hostility into the body politic obviously invites fast and loose treatment of the rule of law, Trump, surrounded by generals and admirals in high government positions, already is reaching beyond the constitutional parameters of presidential powers. My criticism of Obama—in this case, for initiating or extending Clinton and Bush II programs anti-civil libertarian in nature—still on immigrants is discriminably better off than Trump in that he reserved deportation for serious crimes, whereas Trump, according to Shear and Nixon, has directed enforcement officials “to seek the deportation of anyone in the country illegally.”

The nerve center in all of this appears to be Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), a part of DHS, which, following Trump’s announced intention, is embarked on what could be (if not already is) an inclusive stance on deportation, however flimsy the grounds. A DHS fact sheet states, “Under this executive order, ICE will not exempt classes or categories of removal aliens from potential enforcement. All of those present in violation of the immigration laws may be subject to immigration arrest, detention, and, if found removable by final order, removed from the United States.” To expulsion and deportation, add removal; not surprisingly, the reporters observe, “The policy also expands a program that lets officials bypass due process protections such as court hearings in some deportation cases.” Wave of the future? Here we see the possibility for creating a precedent (actually the long-term trend in any case) that weakens due process protections in other areas as well, so greatly is the thrust of law and government alike to that end.

New detention facilities are integral to the anti-immigrant project; so, too, is rule 287(g), which gives ICE the power to penetrate downward into the social system, as part of the great chain of repression. There are few if any bright spots on the horizon. The utility of emphasizing policies toward and the treatment of the immigrant is that one’s analytic perspective is not distorted by the multiplicity of issues already arising. A toehold must be established somewhere to criticize the stage of history we have just entered; symbolically, drone assassination symbolized if not personified Obama’s presidency (along with individual and corporate wealth concentration); for Trump, in just a few weeks, we have become acquainted with the underside of totalitarianism, the breakdown of the human personality, accompanied by the further breakdown of social justice and the implied social contract which makes life worth living. Cynicism, contempt for democratic government, lies, conscious or not, are not the seedbed of human freedom. Let all of us become the immigrant and stand up, in anticipation, to fascism, whether still inchoate or latent. The clouds are darkening: Trump is symptomatic of deeper forces rooting out rights long thought inviolable, yet now, under pressure, shown to be fragile (again, the immigrant) and in need of sustainment.

FEBRUARY 27, 2017

Political Castration of State: Militarization of Government

Photo by DonkeyHotey | CC BY 2.0

Poor Rex Tillerson, Secretary of State, presiding over what had until now been the crown jewel of the president's cabinet, and reduced instead under Trump practically to a footnote on the organization charts. This appears deliberate. State historically had been identified, correctly or not, with the pursuit of peace in international relations. Actually, market penetration and the negotiation of alliances, usually with military implications and geostrategic planning, are more like it. But however involved in the dynamics of realpolitik, and hence, hardly a pacific agency as such, State nevertheless was equidistant to outright militarism, which, via the Pentagon etc., already had ample representation in government. This demotion of State (Tillerson wielded more power in foreign affairs as CEO of Exxon Mobil than presently), beneath both cabinet departments and the armed services, signifies the Rightward thrust characterizing—this early—the new administration.

State in addition to policy formation had always set the ideological tone of government. Now, no longer, on either count, a dramatic upheaval bringing America closer to a permanent state of war psychology, self-appointed to act unilaterally in the role of world leadership. Eclipse of a normalized position in power politics (disturbing as that is), in favor of guardianship of global capitalism, speaks volumes about a qualitative transformation of structural-ideological mission, counterrevolutionary in its very essence. We see, then, the projection of US power and identity into a new realm, long in maturation (start conveniently with the Alien and Sedition Acts two centuries and more ago), the pace quickening in recent years, as the 21st century expression of fascism.

Until this moment, I was satisfied, in thinking about fascism specifically as applied to America, to focus on the structural dynamics of interpenetration: the movement toward integration of business and government, which gradually disavowed government's moral obligation to serve foremost the needs and aspirations of the people, and, closing all loopholes, the perhaps more generic integration, that between capitalism and the state. The paradigm works, whether or not historical reference is made to the gas chamber and concentration camp, because a public sector has been rendered meaningless, an imposed passivity typifies the popular response, and class, wealth, and privilege enjoy the protection of government, affording a degree of stability to the entire social order (ideally, frozen into place).

But if the paradigm of interpenetration works, it is not enough—or rather, neither brute force nor social regimentation has sufficient explanatory value in describing the fascist phenomenon, especially under Trump. (From Truman on, with greater acceleration and substance beginning with Reagan through Obama, it is more than adequate in helping to fill out the context of a co-partnership between capitalism and the state.) But something has now happened to shift the paradigm in a more aggressive direction. No, America has not discovered or re-discovered its moral soul; rather, it has politicized the moral perception into its hardened, uncompromising opposite: from moral to ideological, to foster a self-justifying imperative of hegemony. And even then, only a part of that imperative is opportunistic. Much of post-interpenetration thinking and analysis has given way to what the modern generation is loath to admit or simply doesn't see: a core of irrationality governing behavior and decision-making.

In the past, even irrationality possessed a rational guise, whether as self-interest, patriotism, or clearly articulated goals of power and conquest. Now suddenly it is as though government has become unhinged from its traditional functions and goals (however rational in appearance, the case can be made for their irrationality) and made subject to weakening lest it serve a useful purpose and thus strengthen the bonds of moral obligation. Trump is physician and patient alike, creating, as with mass deportation, or constructing the wall, a policy nightmare and then waking in a cold sweat over how to realize his policies. He feels nothing in the process which can touch his conscience (supposing it exists), but only malaise and the search for ego-inflation. If we return to Tillerson here, we have encapsulated an administration veering toward fascism, beyond the structural properties of interpenetration, to reflect an irrational component of fear masked over by certitude and the promptings of conquest.

I begin with Carol Morello and Anne Gearan's article in the Washington Post, "In first month of Trump presidency, State Department has been sidelined," 2-22-17, informative background on the re-prioritizing of government responsibilities and functions. The opening lines indicate the Department's fall from grace, including the Secretary's relative downgrading (quite unheard of, on both counts, in previous administrations, whether Hull, Acheson, Dulles, or Kerry): "The Trump administration in its first month [the time-frame is important in establishing precedents] has largely benched the State Department from its long-standing role as the preeminent voice of U.S. foreign policy, curtailing public engagement and official travel and relegating Secretary of State Rex Tillerson to a mostly offstage role."

The atmosphere of closure can be seen in the details, e.g., "the month-long lack of daily press briefings," which, since Dulles in the 1950s, had been "a fixture," and which raises the issue of "accountability" that comes from "having a government spokesman available to domestic and foreign press almost every day without fail." Too, the Secretary has "been notably absent from White House meetings with foreign leaders," here, Trudeau and Abe (even missing Netanyahu, sent off instead to Bonn for a Group 20 meeting). The impression is one of "disarray" and the sending of "mixed signals on key issues," yet, I surmise, more is involved, a sea-change itself in foreign policy wherein, the manifest creation of a partial vacuum, other departments, agencies, and military appointments stand ready, able, and willing to fill in the widening emptiness. This does not mean that foreign policy is to be downgraded or neglected under Trump, but only that its very assertiveness is best thought left to those of proven hawkish persuasion.

Nor can the Secretary's visit, as I write, to Mexico, alter the discussion of loss of power and prestige, for timing is everything—a flaunting of superciliousness in that Tillerson arrives the day after Trump announces his plan to step up the deportation of illegal immigrants. (Kelly, of Homeland Security, has joined Tillerson on the mission.) The reporters take the easy way out, suggesting that “confusing lines of communication and authority to the White House,” rather than a power shift, helps explain State's relative—perhaps absolute—decline, and still further, in the same direction of nonstructural analysis, “Trump's inclination to farm out elements of foreign policy to a kitchen Cabinet of close advisers.” He, of course, chose those advisers and defined the boundaries of policy and discussion, a self-fulfilling framework where little is left to chance (including alleged disarray).

Indeed, Tillerson seems more a figurehead, or at best caretaker, a deliberate institutional sign of subordination in White House counsels than the customary preeminence assigned the role, still less an independent and when necessary overriding voice. On the contrary, [u]nlike in previous administrations, the State Department has not always made brief accounts [of his diplomatic] conversations public.” “So far,” Marello and Gearan write, “most of Tillerson's diplomacy has been conducted out of sight”—or perhaps not at all. After he met with EU's head of foreign policy, Federica Mogherini, “the State Department said nothing while [she] held a detailed on-the-record briefing for reporters.” He “has maintained an extremely low profile,” and even “suffered a public embarrassment just a week into the job when Trump rejected his choice of a deputy [Elliott Abrams, for which one is thankful and which shows that Tillerson is far from being a maverick] ... as insufficiently loyal to Trump.”

This penchant for anonymity, whether under orders or fitting his comfort zone, he, unlike his predecessors, “has not taken the usual complement of beat reporters with him on either of his foreign trips so far, opting instead for small ‘pools’ that send reports to others.” If this were a lesser Cabinet post, one might not notice or care. But this is State, which in Trump's own mind is thought less tractable and must be reined in, a veritable hodgepodge of paranoia on his part that is duplicated by his fear of and contempt for the press. He took to Twitter to proclaim “the news media ‘the enemy of the American people.’” Key positions in the administration may be still unfilled, even left that way until the appointee's convincing assurance of absolute loyalty to the Leader, but there is no question about the nature of the regime, a close-to-the-chest mode of governance denuding government while elevating militarism and privatization, a zesty brew preparing the way for the advent of fascism.

***

I should like to explore further State's eclipse of power under Trump, using Tillerson as a case study marking the institutional pivot to a more systemic military orientation in the furtherance of America's hegemonic purposes. To complement the preceding material I turn then to the New York Times, Gardiner Harris and Kirk Semple's article, “Rex Tillerson Arrives in Mexico Facing Twin Threats to Relations,” 2-22-17, once more containing useful information about an aggressive United States policy directed to the hitherto unthinkable: massive deportations of Mexican citizens joined to the construction of a wall the length of the border between the two countries, but also a sharpened harshness in defining commercial relations affecting trade, foreign investment, manufacturing, agricultural markets, etc., a restoration of neocolonialism without (thus far) the headache of a total breakdown in diplomatic relations, a comprehensive sanctions policy, or, perish the thought, armed intervention.

As it is, US Mexican policy—in these short weeks—has taken a qualitative turn for the worse, “twin threats” hanging over “the frayed relationship between the two nations,” i.e., “Trump’s new orders to round up and deport [illegal] immigrants,” and “a separate effort to take a hard look at all American aid to Mexico,” the threat being to use it “to pay for a border wall instead.” This is hard ball, without provocation from the other side about projected hostilities. At this moment, US officials “are required to finish calculating all the money and grants” America is providing Mexico, “a task that Mr. Trump first demanded in the executive order he signed last month directing the construction of a border wall.” Everything comes back to the wall, itself inseparable from the deportation of aliens—a policy decision from the start, and not Trump in a pique (like with the Australian PM) based on injured sensibilities. “Fortress America” was not merely a campaign shibboleth, but advanced notice of hegemonic intent, be it economic, or political, or both.

The deadline for calculating the money and grants, set in a State Department memo, did not say why the review was ordered, “[b]ut its inclusion in the executive order mandating that a wall be built,” shows, in Trump’s thinking, the linkage between “the two issues,” deportation and wall (with Mexico paying the bill). In understatement, the reporters note, “The timing adds to the deep tensions between the two countries.” Was this—the administration “calls the visit a step toward mutual understanding, a way to move the relationship forward”—a good-faith effort to bring about reconciliation? Tillerson’s arrival, with Kelly, is “only a day after the Trump administration released documents ordering a crackdown on immigration in the United States.” Nothing is meant to be achieved, the very indecisiveness of Tillerson in conducting the mission (lack of definite instructions) only rubs salt in the wound. As Harris and Semple report: “there have been few signs that [Tillerson] plays a pivotal role in setting the administration’s foreign policy agenda. He has largely been absent from important White House meetings with foreign leaders, has uttered few words in public since his confirmation and was not even allowed his choice of a top deputy [Abrams].” Muzzled? Hardly. Shy, and learning the ropes? Hardly. We see the faithful execution of policy, provocative in nature, fascistic in substance. Expulsion and walls do not make for a democratic polity.

Tillerson’s assignment is “to tidy up the confrontations” Trump has had “with longtime allies” [as with Mexico, deeper and more far-reaching than that], as for example, his visit to Germany “to reassure his counterparts that Mr. Trump valued” NATO and the EU, despite his statements to the contrary. The reporters acknowledge, however, that Trump’s “rift with Mexico is not only deeper, but also is likely to worsen.” For Mexicans, “the meetings will be an important step toward deciding whether to battle or appease an administration that has consistently excoriated their country.” Rapists at the border crashing in—an altogether unsavory portrayal to which Harris and Semple, not to say Trump, might recur as a reminder of the latter’s depth of hostility (also his quick-trigger pronouncements). Like Mexico, Japan and China, with Trump’s extreme nativism, have to decide whether to battle or appease the administration, although the situation does not appear as dire.

Trump is playing with fire. Mexicans use “a combination of outreach and complaint that has so far proved ineffective, as the twin blows [deportation and provision for the wall] this week demonstrated.” The Merida Initiative, “a bilateral partnership begun in 2007,” provides $1B in unallocated funds for focusing on “fighting organized criminal groups, re-engineering the judicial system, modernizing the border between the two countries,” etc., a diversion of which, spiteful and punitive at best, may hurt both countries, nonetheless is seen as the application of real pressure for Mexico to comply with Trump’s initiatives. Even then, Trump is adamant that Mexico pay for the wall, and, hiring 10,000 new border personnel, that deportation be done on a vast scale. This also hurts (more perhaps than a boycott or blockade) in that the deportation, beyond a living human tragedy, of millions of Mexicans from the US affects what happens at home: Those with “settled lives and jobs” in America “provide most of the nearly $25 billion in remittance payments to Mexican families each year.” Suffering seems of little consequence in Washington, even though a next-door neighbor. I’ll let Luis Videgar, Mexico’s foreign minister, have the last word. He said, on 2-22, “I want to make clear, and in the most emphatic way, that the Mexican government and the Mexican people do not have to accept orders that a government seeks to impose unilaterally on another.”” Bravo, Videgar. The day following, 2-23, had an interesting contretemps, Trump bulldozing and arrogant as ever, if not more so, threatening the military enforcement of mass deportation, Mexico’s leaders bristling with indignation, and Tillerson and Kelly somewhat caught in the middle, trying to calm things down. But the elephant in the room remains Trump; even Kelly, who shouldered the discussion in Mexico, downplayed the military’s role, yet could not give assurances regarding deportation. Trump for working purposes reverses the David-Goliath relation, America the victim, preyed upon by Mexico. Referring to his order “to increase deportations of undocumented immigrants,” he stated (reporters’ summary, here Azam Ahmed, Harris, and Ron Nixon) before invited corporate CEOs that “the days of being treated unfairly by Mexico—on trade, on immigration, on crime—were over.” And in his own words: “You see what’s happening at the border: All of a sudden, for the first time, we’re getting gang members out. And it’s a military operation.””

***

In the wider context, Kelly’s assurances were not reassuring; he is paraphrased by the reporters that he “was saying the opposite [of Trump], trying to damp down fears of a military operation and to assure the public that American soldiers would not be used to police the border.” Kelly himself: “I repeat: There will be no use of military in this [the “this” being, deportation still stands as directed].” Throughout these differences, which have seldom arisen thus far, Trump has kept a firm hand on the tiller—his “penchant for dropping unwelcome surprises during visits between the United States and Mexico.” The first day of Videgar’s Washington visit last month, Trump “signed an executive order to build a wall between the two countries,” and just this week, timed for Tillerson and Kelly’s arrival, “his administration released policies that vastly expanded the potential for deportation of undocumented immigrants.” A welcoming force in the Family of Nations? With Trump as president it is hard to see that there will ever be peace, in the hemisphere or the world. Ahmed et. al. write that Trump’s “actions and disparaging remarks about Mexico have helped push relations between the two countries to their lowest point in decades.”

This was different from previous visits by American diplomats: “Four officials,” two from each country, “walked into a large ballroom with grim faces and made carefully worded comments without taking any questions.... No one suggested that a breakthrough had been made.” Nor was there one. Here Tillerson can be relied on to say the vacuous, the meaningless: “Two strong sovereign countries from time to time will have differences.” He offers little else, as Trump, in full operational mode, continues to vilify, to threaten, to act, using the full weight of government—almost as forgetting capitalism for the moment—to mobilize the society tightly fisted to take on all comers, many reluctant to engage, in reaching for world dominance. For it to be Mexico as the pin cushion, rather than, as a product of the Cold War, traditional enemies, is partly to follow the policies and activities of his predecessors (Obama, on a smaller scale, also engaged in deportations), but partly as well to follow his own xenophobic instincts, having little rhyme or reason in a world of orderly capitalist development. The destinations may be similar, but one holds out the prospects of war as an integral historical course.

In summary, the US, Trump in the official lead, ignores the vital role Mexico plays in America’s well-being, from helping to curb drug trafficking, and checking the flow of immigrants from the countries of Central America (and further south), to being the leading purchaser of American agricultural products, the while fully compliant in not seeking to revamp its subordinate status. But with Trump, Mexico is fighting back, doing the work, in the significant area of hegemonic neocolonialism that one would have hoped the American working class, fostering its own anti-imperialist credentials, would have undertaken, yet thus far has not. Sometimes an authentic David, rather than a bloated Goliath, wins out, or in self-protective mode, manages to hold out. America has fewer and fewer allies in the world; at this writing, America needs Mexico more than Mexico needs it, although sheer differences in power disguise this fact. Trump shows us as we really are, or, strictly speaking, as we are presently becoming. Fascism is no longer a word or frame of mind of the past. It is with us today, Mexico only the latest example of how it translates into practice.

MARCH 1, 2017

Trump’s Neo-Fascist Discourse: CPAC Revisited

For an overview of where America stands, let’s begin with Trump’s speech to the Conservative Political Action Conference, 2-24-17, and work outward from there to two interrelated areas to which he refers, attacks on the media and rising militarism, which together provide, more than a glimpse, an actual serving of notice of coming fascistization in America. We have already seen enough of what to expect, the CPAC speech alerting us, beyond Trump’s demagogic style and appeal (an audience of unabashed worshipers at the altar of Reaction, standing and cheering frequently, whenever a particularly rightist point was made, repeated, caressed, on occasion breaking into the chant, “U.S.A.”—a genuinely spontaneous reception of like-minded souls saturated in resentment and venom to match that of the speaker), to his no-holds-barred, non-apologetic statement of antidemocratic themes and key words.

Out of this experience there emerges a frightening characterization of leadership, perhaps like nothing seen before in a president (the line crossed between traditional conservatism in both major parties to a ruthless, cynical expression of plebeian-flavored ideology in service to the very rich) but defining, if the recent election is to be believed, the wave of the future. Curiously, major outlets like The Times did not provide a full transcript of the speech, so what follows is the verbatim transcript, its value lying in the ferocity of response (as seen in the video) almost as much as in Trump’s words. Like an evil conductor, his baton free-swinging, he has the crowd in the palm of his hand.

Trump immediately closes the distance with CPAC: “Great to be back at CPAC. It’s a place I have really—I love this place. I love you people.... And it really is an honor to be here.” This to a body now part of, but previously outside of, the mainstream of American politics. He adds: “I wouldn’t miss a chance to talk to my friends. These are my friends. And we’ll see you again next year and the year after that. And I’ll be doing this with CPAC whenever I can, and I’ll make sure that we’re here a lot.”

Watching this, one feels how hermetically sealed the presidency will be, Trump withdrawing behind ideological walls, then striking out with one negation of democratic practice after another, with no one to answer to—at least that is his hope and the source of his confidence, the confidence a demagogue exhibits when he is convinced that he has taken power into his own hands: here a proto-geese-stepping army of trained seals which bolsters his ego.

Trump plays with the crowd: “sit down, everybody, come on,” as though he learned his politics at Kazan’s “Face in the Crowd,” a folksy fascism to drive home his appeal. Then the attack on the media, fueled by the interrogatory thrust to encourage a unison of thought in the knowing giveback: “You know the dishonest media, they’ll say he didn’t get a standing ovation. You know why? No, you know why? Because everybody stood and nobody sat. So they’ll say he never got a standing ovation, right?” Trump from the start hits his stride, dripping with sarcasm and attaching the key word “dishonest” to “media” to make it stick, before, later, saying it only applies selectively (after it has been drummed home mercilessly).

“They are the worst,” he continues: “So sit down. Donald Trump did not get a standing ovation. They leave out the part they never sat down. They leave that out. So I just want to thank you.” When a speaker refers to himself/herself in the third person, as here, it is time to watch out. (The tone of being under-appreciated defines, here and below, the personal references; more, there is no break or difference—for the speaker, audience, and supporters at the election— between the Leader and the State.)

For what the thanks? Clear demagogic tendencies that only a thickly-suited psychological armor could believe of oneself, for he describes an early sense of being predestined for greatness: “But you know, my first major speech was at CPAC, probably five or six years ago. First major political speech, and you were there. [He seeks legitimacy as he romances the crowd.] And it was—I loved it. I loved the people, I loved the commotion, and then they did these polls where I went through the roof and I wasn’t even running, right? But it gave me an idea. And I got a little bit concerned when I saw what was happening in the country, and I said let’s go for it. So it was very exciting.”

Trump is Immodest, to be sure, but also self-drafted for higher things, together what becomes a messianic complex, he—one step further—the savior of humankind. He is in his element: “I walked the stage on CPAC; I’ll never forget it, really. I had very little notes and even less preparation. So when you have practically no notes and no preparation and then you leave and everybody was thrilled. I said I think I like this business.” Man of destiny (self-proclaimed) or egomaniacal, both apply and one need not choose between them.

Then the springs of fascism open, where he fully aligns himself with CPAC, citing cascading issues (later developed further), and then, amid standing applause, cements his identity with his followers (the fascistic social bond, as in the way he describes it) and segues into a theme of patriotism never far out of sight: “I would have come last year, but I was worried that I’d be at that time too controversial. We wanted border security, we wanted very, very strong military. We wanted all of the things we're going to get, and people consider that controversial, but you didn't consider it controversial."

Trump has found a home that helps him move the political-ideological spectrum rightward, already present in the configuration of forces to which he appeals, followed by the leap outward, the aforementioned closeness to his constituency. "So," he goes on, "I've been with CPAC for a long time. All of these years we've been together, and now you finally have a president, finally. [thunderous applause] Took you a long time. Took you a long time. And it's patriots like you that made it happen, believe me. You did it because you love your country, because you want a better future for your children, and because you want to make America great again." This is like welcoming a coup—but the long time is over.

Praise of the folk is a sure political formula for success, particularly in scapegoating putative enemies—here more innocuous than his tirades against the media, but sufficient proof of harboring hates and resentments as inseparable both from his personality and his perception of reality. It is innocuous, but nonetheless dangerous: "The media didn't think we would win. The pundits—you're right—they had an idea. The pundits didn't think we'd win. The consultants that suck up all that money—oh, they suck it up—they're so good. They're not good at politics, but they're really good at sucking up people's money. Especially my opponents', because I kept them down to a minimum. [Always the virtuous one] But the consultants didn't think we would win." Trump is instinctively brilliant in setting up the contrast, the nefarious interests and the pristine people, a fascist trick with some pedigree: "But they all underestimated the power of the people, you, and the people proved them totally wrong. This is so true, and this is what's been happening. Never underestimate the people. Never. I don't think it will ever happen again."

Trump is always on the verge of striking out: "And I want you all to know we are fighting the fake news. It's fake. Phony. Fake. A few days ago I called the fake news the enemy of the people, and they are. They are the enemy of the people." With a free press the cornerstone, or prime indicator, of a democratic society, Trump has already declared his lack of sympathy for its value and significance. Cannily, after frequent use of "fake," he draws back, protesting he was not generalizing, even though the repetition and depth of hostility indicate smoldering resentment (a demand for acceptance and even admiration, notwithstanding his disclaimer here): "They're very dishonest people. In fact, in covering my comments, the dishonest media did not explain that I called the fake news the enemy of the people—the fake news. They dropped off the word 'fake'. And all of a sudden the story became the media is the enemy. They take the word 'fake' out. And now I'm saying, oh, no, this is no good. But that is the way they are."

Yet the description is so bitter, the perpetrators of the "fake" so ubiquitous in his view, that his explanation seems unconvincing, not a mea culpa over the need for clearer communication, but a push forward as though his (supposed) intended meaning was always present, and even then a note of anger or sarcasm comes through: "So I'm not against the media, I'm not against the press. I don't mind bad stories if I deserve them, and I tell you, I love good stories, but we won't talk—I don't get too many of them. But I am only against the fake news media or press. Fake. Fake. They have to leave that word."

But does he? “I’m against the people,” he states, “that make up stories and make up sources.” He complains, I think rightly, that sources should be identified (although his group, beginning with Spicer, the press secretary, does not follow the practice). As for criticizing him, “let them say it to my face.” Trump wants admiration and recognition, complimenting Reuters for a “very fair story” about himself, written by “a very honorable” reporter. Again, we see the imposed dichotomy: “There are some great reporters around, they are talented and honest as the day is long; that is great. [Singled out for praise in other statements are Breitbart, the Washington “Times,” etc., and Spicer’s gaggle of newspeople in a closed-door press conference hardly bespeaks respect for a free press, NYT, among others, excluded.] But there are some terrible, dishonest people that do a tremendous disservice to our country, and to our people.”

The attack does not let up, here on the polls during the campaign, presumably stacked against him: “Look at how inaccurate. Look at CBS, look at ABC also. Look at NBC.” His remarks on hated symbols—why he chose and then manipulates them—reveals the selective intolerance of the media among his audience: “Take a look at some of these polls. That were so bad, so inaccurate. And what that does is it creates a whole false narrative. It creates this narrative that it’s just like we’re not going to win.” Here the whining quality becomes unmistakable, if not earlier in the speech: “People say I love Trump but I’m not feeling great today. He can’t win, so I won’t go and vote. It creates a whole false deal, and we have to fight it, folks. We have to fight it. They’re very smart, they’re very cunning, and they’re very dishonest.” And, I would add, they’re essentially centrist, with their own pro-capitalist, pro-defense leanings, and yet to Trump—the personal factor coming into play because of their lack of approval of him, in addition to the obvious, that centrism is for him unacceptable as a menacing Left in disguise—the urge to tear down familiar institutions and structures comes forward.

Relent on this one-sided theme (obsession?), never; for his vindication, as he sees it, lies in his having transcended a political discourse which fails to appreciate his personal qualities, claims to leadership, and policy construct, a well-oiled clock, sealed off from internal opposition and dissent. In that atmosphere Trump can thrive as a Disciple of Truth, one who places patriotism foremost and identifies with flag-worship. A sotto voce tribute to the Second Amendment brings the audience to its feet, but he plays civil libertarian by praising the First: “I love the First Amendment. Nobody loves it better than me. Nobody—who uses it more than I do? But the First Amendment gives all of us ... the right to speak our minds freely. It gives you the right and me the right to criticize fake news and criticize it strongly.”

One would have hoped for a more inclusive usage of the First than attacking the press, but his thinking is warped by, not surprising, conspiracy theory in explaining fake news: “And many of these groups are part of large media corporations, [while favoring wealth, he adopts the Nazi playbook through implying his position of semi-socialism, as in National Socialism, deliberately obfuscating the corporatist foundations of, in Trump’s case, the intended foundations of the polity] that have their own agenda. And it’s not your agenda and it’s not the country’s agenda, it’s their own agenda.” By this point, a free press is even difficult to conceptualize.

Trump here buries it: “... and even now [following the campaign] the fake news doesn’t tell the truth. Doesn’t tell the truth. So just in finishing, I say it doesn’t represent the people, it never will represent the people, and we’re going to do something about it because we have to go out and we have to speak our minds and we have to be honest.” The veiled threat is now disclosed; government suppression, in context, appears a live option. Yes, “to do something about it.”

He dovetails the thought with a boast about victory in the election—there being little wiggle-room for nonconformity and dissent: “Our victory was a victory and a win for conservative values. And our victory was a win for everyone who believes it’s time to stand up for America, to stand up for the American worker, and to stand up for the American flag. Yeah, there we should stand up. There we should stand up. And, by the way, we love our flag.” In this orgasm of patriotism, one must not overlook the reference to the American worker (increasingly cropping up in Trump’s speeches), part of the theme of class-reconciliation and the diversion of analysis from the monopoly-capitalist foundations of the political economy.

Trump announces (obliquely) the advent of the New World Order, resting on America’s power and virtue: “There is such love in this country for everything we stand for. You saw that on Election Day and you’re going to see it more and more. So we’re all part of this historic movement, a movement the likes of which the world has never seen before. There’s never been anything like this.” The general argument laid down, Trump now rhapsodizes on the new society he seeks to shape—America First, as part of a paradigm of global order masterminded by America: “I’m here to tell you what this means for the future of the Republican Party and the future of America. First, we need to define what this great, great, unprecedented movement is and what it actually represents.”

The fortress-imagery comes immediately to the foreground (yet with an implied active foreign policy), a boastful quality its natural accompaniment: “The core conviction of our movement is that we are a nation that will put its own citizens first. For too long we’ve traded away our jobs to other countries, so terrible. We’ve defended other nations’ borders while leaving ours wide open—anybody can come in. Oh, we’re going to build a wall, don’t worry about it. We’re building the wall. We’re building the wall. In fact, it’s going to start soon. Way ahead of schedule. Way, way, way ahead of schedule.”

What can one make of this? Although party is referenced, Trump thinks in terms of movement, which has the potential, aside from popular mobilization as a step toward regimentation, of bypassing constitutional restraints for a presumed higher order. Too, he seeks to make the wall a certainty, central to withdrawal from normalized international relations, and, beyond nativism, facing the world as though heretofore the victim of horrendous forces—again the immigrant as scapegoat.

We have a borderless America, open to pillage, unprotected, thereby inciting others to take advantage. This calls for internal purgation, cleansing society of those who wish to do America harm, and resulting in a state of new-found innocence and moral purity. (How long, once the process of removal begins, one wonders does it take for the line between immigrant and citizen to be breached, native-born dissidents the symbolical immigrant in our midst.) Thus, Trump observes, of his point man at DHS, “Gen. Kelly, by the way, has done a fantastic job. Fantastic, the job he’s done.” (I’ll return to Kelly outside the confines of the speech, when he justifies full-scale deportation.)

From the reference to Kelly Trump jumps to an angry denunciation of the immigrant, leaving no doubt about the seriousness of his intentions in carrying out mass deportations and the dark waters he has plumbed: “And remember, we are getting the bad ones out. [This is POTUS speaking, not some rabble-rouser dragged in off the street.] These are bad dudes. We’re getting the bad ones out. Okay? We’re getting the bad—if you watch these people, it’s like oh, gee, that’s so sad. [It’s not clear whether he’s caricaturing his critics, or just being sarcastic.] We were getting bad people out of this country. People who shouldn’t be, whether its drugs or murder. We’re getting bad ones out. They’re the ones who go first. I said it from day one.” Presumably others would follow, charged with lesser crimes, until the reservoir is drained.

Trump’s anger has not (actually it never seems to have) abated. Rebuilding America, beyond a cost-benefit analysis, targets the neglectful within our midst, one more generic scapegoat to deal with: “Basically, all I’ve done is keep my promise [the reference to deportation]. We’ve spent trillions overseas while allowing our own infrastructure to fall into total disrepair and decay. In the Middle East we’ve spent, as of four weeks ago, $6 trillion. Think of it. And by the way, the Middle East is in what—I mean, it’s not even close—it’s in much worse shape than it was 15 years ago. If our presidents would have gone to the beach for 15 years, we would be in much better shape than we are right now. [This is not FDR advocating for dam construction by PWA, but a snarling chief executive feeling free to belittle his predecessors, not, however, on their record of deregulation, war, and intervention, but simply, malicious neglect, courtesy, as is Trump’s style, thrown out the window.] That I can tell you. Could have been a hell of a lot better. We could have rebuilt our country three times with that money.”

The stage is set for the man-on-horseback theme so beloved in French history: “This is the situation I inherited. I inherited a mess, believe me.” The follow-up is the dismantlement of government, at his initiative, the health-care system a clear priority: “We also inherited a failed health care law that threatens our medical system with absolute and total catastrophe.” That may be so, but for the opposite reason than he intends: not better coverage and squaring off with the medical, health care, and pharmaceutical communities/industries, but, since he has delayed announcing changes, an implied privatization consistent with other proposed changes in federal programs.

Not satisfied, Trump seeks to blame the Democrats, differentiated from the folk, and to view elections as mandates to rollback welfare programs, however sound in constitutional terms: “Obamacare doesn’t work, folks. I could say, I could talk. And now people are starting to develop a little—but the people that you’re watching, they’re not you. They’re largely, many of them are the side that lost. They lost the election. It’s like, how many elections do we have to have? They lost the election.” Stated with finality; one wonders, had he lost and Clinton won, psyched up as he was for leadership, whether he would have become more raucous, possibly even envisioning a coup. No matter, the point is, he won, and is, from his day one (and before), planning the total reconstruction of government and homogenization of domestic society.

On health care, he claims much, without advocating for a public factor informing its workings: “Obamacare covers very few people. And remember, deduct from the number all of the people that had great health care that they loved that was taken away from them. Millions of people were very happy with the health care. They had their doctor, they had their plan. Remember the lie? 28 times. You can keep your doctor. You can keep your plan. Over and over and over again, you heard it. So we’re going to repeal and replace Obamacare.”

Trump is not replacing a single-payer system, nor even provision for a public option; rather, he wants thus far a return to the status quo ante, with little prospect of the elimination of previously-held vested interests. If that were not so, health care would be the lone exception (not including, of course, the vast increase in military spending and execution) in his restructuring of government and bringing the private sector, as before, into the picture.

For one who gives off isolationist signals, Trump is remarkably belligerent, gung ho a useful appellation here. This is to swing into high gear: “We inherited a national debt that has doubled in eight years. Think of it, $20 trillion. It’s doubled. And we inherited a foreign policy marked by one disaster after another. [His non-stop thinking is not free association so much as it is juxtaposing somewhat disparate topics for the purpose of reinforcing each.] We don’t win anymore. When was the last time we won? Did we win a war? Did we win anything? We’re going to win. We’re going to win big, folks. We’re going to start winning again. Believe me.”

I do, because he seeks to run a war polity, perhaps better, a Warrior State, an interesting mixture in which the polity becomes stripped down, the warrior state combined with a patina of laissez-faire. In other words, curb government when regulation is involved, expand it when the military is. He uses the past as sanction (as with the national debt and health care) to project a policy of winning as everything. Trump is on a roll: “But we’re taking a firm, bold, and decisive measure. We have to, to turn things around.” Those familiar with German history will immediately recognize an implied invocation of the stab-in-the-back legend. Trump is again on a Nazi-like wave length: “The era of empty talk is over. It’s over. Now is the time for action. So let me tell you about the actions that we’re taking right now to deliver on our promise to the American people and on my promise to make America great again.”

We are back to square one, the wall and deportation, but by this point in the speech and the revelation of his thinking, this is more than nationalism and isolationism. Like a giant jigsaw puzzle, he fits these and other elements, including vindictiveness, into a workable plan of what I called in previous writing, the pre-fascist configuration containing within itself its actualization. The military component to his vision and planning is never far (as will be seen) from sight.

Hence, he states with accustomed bravado and immodesty: “We’ve taken swift and strong action to secure the southern border of the United States and begin the construction of a great, great border wall. By doing this and with the help of our great border police, with the help of ICE [Immigration and Customs Enforcement, part of DHS, and Kelly’s bailiwick, now increasingly important to planners], with the help of Gen. Kelly and all of the people that are so passionate about this. Our border patrol, what they do—they came and endorsed me, ICE came and endorsed me—they never endorsed a presidential candidate before. They might not be allowed to, but they were disgusted with what they saw.” (We’ll note shortly that most ICE personnel warmed to their task of deportation and, it turns out, harassment, gladly following Trump’s lead—which speaks to the complicity of government in following the orders of a strong leader.)

This switch in emphasis from the Muslim world to Mexico should not go unnoticed, Mexicans, for Trump, seen as a more immediate and serious threat, as though every Mexican is a drug dealer and potential murderer (the audience at one with him in sentiment): “We’ll stop it, we’ll stop the drugs from pouring into our nation and poisoning our youth. Pouring in. Pouring in. We get the drugs, they get the money. We get the problems. They get the cash. No good. No good. Going to stop.”

The analysis has a cost-benefit result, immigrants draining America’s resources that might be put to use in rebuilding “struggling American communities, including our inner cities.” Trump does not, however, mention his aversion to the savings in “tax dollars” which are then being applied to public functions—private developers take notice. But the overriding point is less economy in government than the ferreting out of enemies in America’s midst: “As we speak today, immigration officers are finding the gang members, the drug dealers, and the criminal aliens [he lumps them together as one] and throwing them the hell out of our country. And we will not let them back in. They’re not coming back in, folks. They do, they’re going to have bigger problems than they ever dreamed of.” I would add, in relation to Mexican immigrants, stereotyping on Trump’s part, fully evident here, is a well-known trait among authoritarian types.

Much the remainder of the speech deals with a grocery list of demands, the important ones accorded slightly larger discussion. He has “withdrawn America from the Trans-Pacific Partnership so that we can protect our economic freedom,” an example of Trump’s deeply-ingrained unilateralism. He has also disclaimed interest in multilateral trading frameworks, believing as with TPP America would benefit from using its muscle for one-on-one negotiations and agreements: “And we’re going to make trade deals, but we’re going to do one-on-one—one-on-one—and if they misbehave, we terminate the deal, and then they come back and we’ll make a better deal. None of these big quagmire deals that are [a] disaster.” Next he criticizes NAFTA, following from his general view of trade agreements. Then, he relates he authorized the future construction of the Keystone and Dakota pipeline and issued the rule that pipes have to be made of American steel and in this country. (Here Trump is critical of demonstrators of pipeline construction altogether.)

In his review of his policy-making, he makes a point of economic deregulation, as though regulation was anathema to production, employment, and development (thus failing to appreciate its capitalist uses—a sign of Trump’s ultimate lack of sophistication concerning the modern economy, despite his great success as a capitalist): “We’re preparing bold action to lift the restrictions on American energy, including shale oil, natural gas, and beautiful, clean coal, and we’re going to put our miners back to work. Miners are going back to work .... We have begun a historic program to reduce the regulations that are crushing our economy. Crushing.”

And they are “crushing our jobs,” he adds, “because companies can’t hire. We’re going to put the regulation industry out of work and out of business.” Yet with all that he represents and has said before CPAC, Trump’s turnabout on regulation is suspicious, as though living in a parallel universe: “And by the way, I want regulation.” Worse still, he wants comprehensive regulation, except when it hurts business: “I want to protect our environment, I want regulations for safety, I want all of the regulations that we need, and I want them to be so strong and so tough, but we don’t need 75 percent of the repetitive regulations that hurt companies, hurt jobs, make us noncompetitive overseas with other companies from other countries, that we don’t need.”

One senses, after stating that he will put “the regulation industry out of work and out of business,” a mild case of political schizophrenia has set in: “But we’re going to have regulation. It’s going to be really strong and really good, and we’re going to protect our environment and we’re going to protect the safety of our people and our workers, okay.”

There is more, e.g., lowering taxes: “Another major promise is tax reform. We are going to massively lower taxes on the middle class, reduce taxes on American business, and make our tax code more simple and much more fair for everyone [like his use of the worker, Trump cites the middle class when papering over the large gains that would accrue to business], including the people and the business.” In anticipation of “tax reform,” jobs are starting to return to America. Trump will be Trump: “In fact, I think I did more [on this count] than any other president.” He met, as President-elect, with the executives of leading corporations—“I just wanted to save a little time”—which, because of the results of the election, were “making major investments” in the US. In the spirit of unrestrained capitalism (to much applause) he fairly blurted out, “It’s time for all Americans to get off of welfare and get back to work. “You’re going to love it. You are going to love it.”

Finally, in his itemization of changes he wants to bring about, he comes to the military: “We’re also putting in a massive budget request for our beloved military. And we will be substantially upgrading all of our military, all of our military, offensive, defensive, everything.” Nothing could be clearer, with respect to the military, and I would contend, Trump’s proneness to fascism: “Bigger and better and stronger than ever before, and hopefully we’ll never have to use it, but nobody’s going to mess with us, folks. Nobody. It will be one of the greatest military buildups in American history.”

Be it said at this juncture, militarism is not only about engaging in war; it is also about the hierarchical structure of society: the ideological transference from a civil to a military social order inculcating service to the nation, respect for authority, habituation to command, the purging of dissidents, etc. The vast increase in military spending announced (2-28) after CPAC underscores in material-aggressive terms the commitment of the Trump administration’s policy toward war, business growth, a docile labor force—expenditures, incidentally, done specifically at the expense of social welfare measures at home.

To justify this, he sees only present weakness and the hint of betrayal: “No one will dare question, as they have been, because we’re very depleted, very, very depleted sequester. Nobody will question our military might again.” He speaks of “peace through strength,” a seemingly harmless phrase, and probably widely subscribed to in American political and military circles; yet it has an ominous ring, as though given currency by Germany (the analogy of Strength through Joy) in the ‘thirties. “Depletion” has become Trump’s favorite word, in describing what needs to be done—primarily in military terms. Strangelove’s concern about the juices drying up, has met its match. The only thing not to be depleted, for Trump, is the private sector, the public intentionally to be cut to the bone. This politicized quid pro quo, where strengthening the military leads incisively to weakening domestic regulation and (such as it is) reform, characterizes the salience of Trump’s policy framework.

Trump goes from the military to national security, starting by saying that he has “directed the defense community to develop a plan to totally obliterate ISIS,” which leads him back to the topic of the wall: “At the same time, we fully understand that national security begins with border security. Foreign terrorists will not be able to strike America if they cannot get into our country.” He once more returns to an impending Muslim threat, implying an equivalent yet different kind of threat from that posed by Mexico, terrorism versus narcotics and crime. He observes, “Take a look at what’s happening to our world, folks. And we have to be smart. We have to be smart. We can’t let it happen to us. So let me state this as clearly as I can: We are going to keep radical Islamic terrorists the hell out of our country.” There is considerably less attention in the speech, almost none, devoted to terrorism (the reasons unclear), but the logic of his position, emphasis on a strong military, is that it hovers over his thinking: “We will not be deterred from this course, and in a matter of days we will be taking brand new action to protect our people and keep America safe.” Yes, a touch of braggadocio: “You will see the action. I will never, ever apologize for protecting the safety and security of the American people.”

Nearing the close, Trump delivers (what he believes to be) a knockout punch: “One by one, we’re checking off the promises we made to the people of the United States. One by one. A lot of promises. And we will not stop until the job is done. We will reduce your taxes, we will cut your regulations, we will support our police, we will defend our flag.” In addition, he states, “We will rebuild our military. We will take care of our great, great veterans. We’re taking care of our veterans. We will fix our broken and embarrassing trade deals that are no good. None of them.” In any such list, it is not out of place to find this: “And, by the way, we will protect our Second Amendment.” Nor to give fulsome praise to the National Rifle Association: “And they’re great people. And by the way, they love our country. They love our country. The NRA has been a great supporter. They love our country.”

He has touched base on several foci of Reaction, including CPAC itself, but it is at the close of his speech that Trump reaches the heights of patriotic grandeur. Supposed concern for the American worker provides him some leverage in calling for mass acquiescence in what he is defining as the national purpose—haute capitalism, militarism, societal consensus, and the, perhaps in his mind, interrelated identities between immigrants and terrorists. The cohesion of this vision promises, or so he believes, the stabilization of the political order.

Extolling the political importance of the worker serves as an entering wedge into heightened patriotism and social inclusiveness (albeit on hierarchical lines), much of this buried under the surface of public discourse: “The forgotten men and women of America will be forgotten no longer. That is the heart of this new movement and the future of the Republican party. People came to vote and these people, the media, they said where are they coming from? What’s going on here? These are hard-working, great, great Americans.... The GOP will be from now on the party also of the American worker.” Trump points to the party’s growth, immodestly taking credit: “I won’t say it was because of me, but it was, okay?” Here, near the end, I take my leave from the speech and explore related matters, either previewed (before) or summarized (now), a task made easier because Trump is like a broken record, a person of few and limited ideas—hardly the fertile creativity of FDR and his colleagues.

I am struck by the militarization of consciousness in his speech, but preceding it we already have a clear indication of Trump’s devotion to militarism and his respect/admiration for generals, admirals, and those of military background—provided of course they don’t take issue with him on broad policy goals. But unlike flag-worship, or in addition to it, he seeks to make an analytical case for militarism, predicated on sheer power, geopolitical ambition, and, at home, the high defense requirements (or so he imagines) of Fortress America. Defense is never for its own sake, but the reverse side of, and indistinguishable from, offense.

I have in mind, beyond budgets and boasting, the high number of military personnel occupying major positions in the administration. This takes on the appearance of a fait accompli, so early does it occur in, and places its stamp on, the administration. Nothing quite like it before. The signs are all around us. Take for example Peter Baker and Eric Schmitt's New York Times article, "3 Generals Bound by Iraq Will Guide Trump on Security" (2-21). Briefly, the reporters write that Trump's "appointment of H.R. McMaster, an Army lieutenant general, as his new national security adviser creates a powerful troika of senior officers who served in Iraq, teaming him up with Defense Secretary Jim Mattis and John F. Kelly, the secretary of homeland security, both retired four-star Marine generals." Significantly Baker and Schmitt note: "This administration is the first to have all three security jobs filled by senior military veterans at the same time." The best case for the generals, that they bucked the military hierarchy, may or not stand up when one considers—supposed independence notwithstanding—how far they have come in and then beyond that hierarchy. Moreover, that Steve Bannon sits on the national security principals committee only adds to the closed nature of military and strategic thinking.

The New York Times editorial, "Mr. Trump's 'Deportation Force' Prepares an Assault on American Values," (2-22), as the name implies, sweeps away any notion of Kelly's alleged moderation. His memos just released are the "battle plan" for this deportation force Trump promised in the campaign: "They are remarkable for how completely they turn sensible immigration policies [what would make them sensible, except presumably in accord with Obama's strictures?] upside down and backward. For how they seek to make the deportation machinery more extreme and frightening (and expensive), to the detriment of deeply held American values." With Obama, deportation was reserved for "dangerous criminals, national-security threats and recent border crossers."

By contrast, Kelly "has swept away those notions. He makes practically every deportable person a deportation priority. He wants everybody, starting with those who have been convicted of any crime, no matter how petty or old." Proportionality is out the window. This is emerging as the fascist state in microcosm, from contempt for the rule of law to an avowed militaristic mind-set in the conduct of policy itself (mine). The editorial—to NYT's credit—continues: "The targets now don't even have to be criminals. They could simply have been accused of a crime (that is, still presumed "innocent") or have done something that makes an immigration agent believe that they might possibly face charges." In sum, Kelly is "keeping his options open about whether to short-circuit due process [currently, those caught within two miles of the border for swift deportation without a hearing] with a coast-to-coast show-me-your-papers policy." This becomes a police state, particularly with the enlargement of ICE officers and Border Patrol guards, along with the transmission downward to local and state officials to conduct similar operations. The Times again: "He [Kelly] wants to ramp up programs deputizing state and local law enforcement officers as immigration enforcers. He calls them 'a highly successful force multiplier,' which is true if you want a dragnet."

We have here the intersection of military spending, deportation, and the wall, the latter perhaps less possible to spot, but in Trump's thinking and planning, not only adding to the political claims for the necessity of a strong military, but to ensure, beyond the undocumented immigration people, that the citizenry live partly in fear (evident today) and accommodative to the combined political-military establishment under Trump. Kelly is instrumental in molding an uncritical base for sanctioning the weakening of meaningful civil liberties for American society, his remark on “force multiplier” showing how deeply military lingo infuses the administration.

Here Trump’s attack on the media joins the wall as feeding into the general militaristic posture of how he is transforming America into a land of fear and suspicion, a Hobbesian world of international struggle whose counterpart at home is class-jealousy, such as remains, of class-differences, and a soft population weakening the nation with its claims for social justice. Can America outlive the Trump Phenomenon, and if so, is there still something worse coming down the pike? Continuity, as opposed to revolutionary change, best describes the structural-historical process. America elected Trump as testimony to the century-old accommodation to its experience of increasing consolidation and military engagement and preparedness in defining its pattern of capitalist development.

MARCH 6, 2017

Descent into Fascism: Corporate-Militarist Paradigm

Trump’s speech to a joint-session of Congress, 2-28, is a milestone in political-ideological deception. Joseph Goebbels could not have said it better, the “it” being the inversion of American reality as the nation seeks a further leg up on global hegemony and at the same time cheapens if not degrades its labor force. Liberals feel a sense of outrage, focusing their criticism on much benighted Jeff Sessions, rather than on the emasculation of government, near-destruction of the social welfare sector, a monstrous arms build-up, absolute spoliation of water and other resources, and defying other environmental needs and safeguards, not least the effect of fracking and coal mining on climate change.

Liberals, i.e., Democrats, are either unable and unwilling to protest on the systemic level (whatever the issue) or have already become, as complicit partners, a hazily leftwing extension of the Trumpian weltanschauung or consensus forming in the United States. From a Left standpoint, they are a disgrace to human identity and humanitarian ideals, like the Republicans corporatist in assumptions (here a modified hierarchical social order) and militaristic in every fiber of their being, a heritage of anticommunism still subscribed to and intended by their patriotism to remove all stigma to disloyalty. The pusillanimous fight they are putting up against Trump tends to confirm the preceding characterization.

By descent I don’t mean final destination arrived at, merely, up until now the circumnavigation of fascism (in its early, more corporatist form, as in the activities and approval of the National Association of Manufacturers, rather than—isolationism quite pronounced—militarism in overt form) beginning in the 1920s. In Europe and Japan there are of course stirrings of fascism in that decade, with Italy actualizing the form, and in the 1930s Germany and Japan truly come into their own in that respect. The source for this development is capitalism, with specific ideologies, now incorporating avowed militarism, becoming rationales for both intra-capitalist rivalries and blunt anti-socialism.

With and following World War II, militaristic underpinnings have become a necessitous element in the definition of capitalism, nowhere more clearly seen than in the US. Now, with Trump, circumnavigation around, is turning directly into the penetration of the genuine article. We move, under Trump, as in his address to Congress, from “exploitative capitalism,” the traditional form, to “liar capitalism,” which subsumes into itself the former, yet adds a dimension of ulterior disguise and motive that makes one alert to the prospect of permanent change.

Fascism can be many-layered, and, as in Nazi Germany, seemingly less bottomless in depravity, but as I’ve noted elsewhere, it doesn’t require the concentration camp or gas chamber, and primarily, in historical form, it is based ultimately on the close alignment (co-partnership) of capitalism and the state, or more concretely, business and government. In that structural context, the impetus of the first to the second (although a reverse influence is also manifest) is the creation and reinforcement of hierarchy as the organizing principle of the social order. The capitalist class system, already in place, is then superimposed on what becomes a class-state, to defend and replenish of which the military factor springs forth as though by necessity.

For fascism to operate, the parallel structures require the degree of integration which renders each of them more internally advanced, the better to complement and reinforce the potential war-provoking tendencies of both. And more, social regimentation as well is a long-term product of class and war (or its constant threat as presented by its leaders). Even without their closeness in a formal sense, we see that each, especially starting with the twentieth century, contains, as a separable factor, the same quest for hegemony and self-aggrandizement having the effect of creating a common, synthesized ruling group.

Trump, in all his arrogant innocence—innocence in the sense of ignorance of how devastating his role is, for the destruction of a society that still claims to be a democratic polity—is fairly transparent in the deceptions practiced, measured by the policies already charted or enacted compared with statements he is making (the speech to Congress) or has already made. He is adept at locating the discussion of military strengthening, tax favoritism to giant corporations, the near-destruction of public-school education (only one of several options, with no special tax benefits), and the generalized dismantlement of government, in a context with platitudes about citizenship, patriotism, American greatness, in sum, a demagogic mishmash whose function is, beyond promoting concentrated wealth, deregulation, and national power, the obfuscation pure and simple of all policy making because detrimental to societal democratization and the heading off of the threat of fascism (itself subject to all manner of euphemistic expressions).

Let’s turn, then, to the speech. (I am drawing on the prepared text, and may have missed slight alterations or verbal asides—as well as his use of repetition.) Trump begins with a celebration of “our Nation’s path toward civil rights and the work that still remains,” and a philo-Semitism addressing the threat to Jewish community centers and the desecration of Jewish cemeteries. High-minded and certainly unobjectionable, save that his framework and appointments—a genuinely white man’s party—and his remarks in defense of Judaism which come down to the ironclad support for Israel, purposely lack a (small-“d”) democratic thrust in relating to each. He follows the tribute with, typical throughout the speech, a splurge of sentiment in which his speechwriters (Bannon? etc.) must have taken delight in their craftsmanship: “Each American generation passes the torch of truth, liberty and justice—in an unbroken chain all the way down to the present. This torch is now in our hands. And we will use it to light up the world. I am here tonight to deliver a message of unity and strength, and it is a message deeply delivered from my heart.”

The American future converges on Trump, a frightening thought when one considers how he is reaching already to become the Leader, his melding with his followers (it is presumed he speaks for the Nation), the toleration hardly expected to be coming applied to dissident views or, in steamroller mode on his part, resistance and opposition. Thus, he states: “A new chapter of American Greatness is now beginning. A new national pride is sweeping across our Nation. And a new surge of optimism is placing impossible dreams firmly within our grasp.” After more of the same, this wondrous state of mind is joined by hints at military superiority and greatness: “Our allies will find that America is once again ready to lead. All the nations of the world—friend or foe—will find that America is strong, America is proud, and America is free.”

In his contemplation of the future (America soon will celebrate its 250th year), he then begins to pull out the stops on his fervent nationalism, his ridicule of past presidents, his claims of generosity in foreign policy: “I will not allow the mistakes of recent decades past to define the course of our future. For too long, we’ve watched our middle class shrink as we’ve exported our jobs and wealth to foreign countries [outsourcing on the part of the very corporations he praises in the speech and as a constant theme]. We’ve financed and built one global project after another [not to say, his own activities in creating international projects], but ignored the fates of our children in the inner cities of Chicago, Baltimore, Detroit—and so many other places throughout our land.”

Concern for the poor is touching, but it seems contrary to his Billionaire Cabinet, plans for military expansion which directly affect the fate of ameliorating conditions in the inner cities, and his active promotion, the whole weight of his administration, on furthering the inequitable distribution of wealth. And the recriminatory spirit continues, this despite his previous disregard for borders where investment is concerned: “We’ve defended the borders of other nations, while leaving our own borders wide open, for anyone to cross [open sesame for anti-immigrant policy and feeling]—and for drugs to pour in at a now unprecedented rate. And we’ve spent trillions of dollars overseas, while our infrastructure at home has so badly crumbled.” That infrastructure, frequently mentioned in the speech, is the province of privatization, not, like the New Deal, testimony to the will of government to stand on behalf of the public function.

Here Trump the megalomaniac speaks up, the undisputed leader of a mass movement bursting the seams of government itself, so vast the groundswell for change as he directs it: “Then, in 2016, the earth shifted beneath our feet. The rebellion started as a quiet protest [from the Nazi playbook, making “rebellion” the basis for a popular movement of the dispossessed, and not the rich industrialist or banker], spoken by families of all colors and creeds—families who just wanted a fair shot for their children, and a fair hearing for their concerns.” It grew, plain folk angry and on the march: “But then the quiet voices became a loud chorus—as thousands of citizens now spoke out together, from cities small and large, all across our country.” (In all fairness to Trump, this was a somewhat accurate description of the 2016 election, in which the fascistic proclivities of a wide swath of the citizenry came out of the woodwork to give him the nomination and election, provided of course it is also recognized that electorate and candidate each reinforced these proclivities of the other.)

He completes the description of political inundation, a tidal wave of Reaction: “Finally, the chorus became an earthquake—and the people turned out by the tens of millions, and they were all united by one very simple, but crucial demand, that America must put its own citizens first—because only then, can we truly MAKE AMERICA GREAT AGAIN [the form in the transcript]. If this is not a good introduction to incipient fascism, I don't know what is, as if, to go back, Hitler told the workers (another euphemism, "soldiers in industry") you are first and foremost a German, divorced from class roots or alternative identities.

From there to the aforementioned mishmash, militarism and monopoly capital get somehow lost in the deeds putatively to be accomplished. Thus, "Dying industries will come roaring back to life. Heroic veterans will get the care they so desperately need. Our military will be given the resources its brave warriors so richly deserve. Crumbling infrastructure will be replaced with new roads, bridges, tunnels, airports and railways gleaming across our beautiful land.... Above all else, we will keep our promises to the American people." Here Trump wants "to update the Nation on the progress I've made in keeping those promises."

The honor roll of corporate wealth is presented as exemplification of America First, yet in several cases known previously for their overseas investments: "Since my election, Ford, Fiat-Chrysler, General Motors, Sprint, Softbank, Lockheed, Intel, Walmart, and many others, have announced that they will invest billions of dollars in the United States [that may be true, to be on the good side of Trump] and will create tens of thousands of new American jobs." But none with a practical presence in international economic affairs is going to divest and return home, nor attempt to alter the structure of world capitalism (except as it continues to further US prominence and predominance globally), which is already in America's favor.

In Trump's bag of rhetorical tricks, we see the inveterate boastfulness, he, the near messiah, flattered by the loyalty of a large public in the maw of false consciousness, take credit for the rise of the market simultaneous with, not coincidentally, drastic cutting of the welfare sector, his supporters cheering "U.S.A." along the way. Only the military benefits from his priorities and framework of government: "The stock market gained almost three trillion dollars in value since the election on November 8th, a record. [I think here of Huey Long's "Every man a king," except that Trump operates on a gigantic scale—and Long possibly had some redeeming features, such as eschewing race-baiting in the deep South.] We've saved taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars by bringing down the price of the fantastic new F-35 jet fighter [debatable savings given the record thus far, and, when Trump uses "fantastic," unlikely to upset the apple cart given his admiration of weapons systems], and will be saving billions more dollars on contracts all across our Government. We have placed a hiring freeze on non-military and non-essential Federal workers."

Behind the theme of budget savings, however, lies the cardinal demand for deregulation, which opens the way for an attack on the environment: "We have undertaken a historic effort to massively reduce job-crushing regulations [the use of working people to camouflage staking out a claim for corporate capitalism], creating a deregulation task force inside of every Government agency: imposing a new rule which mandates that for every 1 new regulation, 2 old regulations must be eliminated; and stopping a regulation that threatens the future and livelihoods of our great coal miners." The 1 for 2 ruling is, in conception, a veiled effort to destroy, given its arbitrary nature, the regulatory effectiveness of the process—cynicism nonpareil. As for the environment, on pending measures, he says: "We have cleared the way for the construction of the Keystone and Dakota Access Pipelines—thereby creating tens of thousands of jobs—and I've issued a new directive that new American pipelines be made with American steel."

Quite a first five weeks of activity, this reminds me of a dystopian vision of FDR's Hundred Days in microcosm, a vicious approach to what should have been a rebuilding effort of renaissance proportions. Stopping the supply of drugs from entering America becomes the whipping boy for unrelated, or seemingly related, aspects of Trump's program: obviously, the construction of the wall, but also the purification of domestic America, immigration-controls in general, and job creation. Trump's get-tough policies represent a top-down framing of injecting totalitarian controls on society, using crime as a catch-all for pretext of embellishing the theme of Fortress America, which implicitly suffuses the speech.

He states: "We will stop the drugs from pouring into our country and poisoning our youth—and we will expand treatment for those who have become so badly addicted." Then the direct jump: "At the same time, my Administration has answered the pleas of the American people for immigration enforcement and border security. By finally enforcing our immigration laws, we will raise wages, help the unemployed, save billions of dollars, and make our communities safer for everyone." Hard to know if he here fuses Mexicans and Muslims from the seven proscribed countries as a unified threat, but the speech constantly invokes a genocidal vision of so-called deplorables or undesirables: "We want all Americans to succeed—but that can't happen in an environment of lawless chaos. We must restore integrity and the rule of law to our borders."

Rule of law is problematic, with the much-feared round-up already in progress. Restoring integrity means, "we will soon begin the construction of a great wall [now Trump, Chinese Emperor] along our southern border. It will be started ahead of schedule and, when finished, it will be a very effective weapon against drugs and crime. As we speak, we are removing gang members, drug dealers and criminals that threaten our communities and prey on our citizens. Bad ones are going out as I speak tonight and as I have promised."

Trump has not forgotten the presumed Muslim threat: "Our obligation is to serve, protect, and defend the citizens of the United States. We are also taking strong measures to protect our Nation from Radical Islamic Terrorism." In fact, he sees that practically lurking under every bed: "According to data provided by the Department of Justice, the vast majority of individuals convicted for terrorism-related offenses since 9/11 came here from outside of our country," and then there are attacks "in France, in Belgium, in Germany and all over the world." And so, "[i]t is not compassionate, but reckless, to allow uncontrolled entry from places where proper vetting cannot occur. Those given the high honor of admission to the United States should support this country and love its people and its values."

Spoken like a true patriot. Trump is on the job, having issued orders for the "Department of Defense to develop a plan to demolish and destroy ISIS," impose "new sanctions on entities and individuals who support Iran's ballistic missile program," and reaffirm "our unbreakable alliance with the State of Israel," all of this immediately followed by a tribute to the late Antonin Scalia, whose wife sat in the gallery. As he approaches the closing, his speech takes on a current of hyper-nationalism, achieved through criticism of previous, especially Obama's, administrations.

The gloves are off: "Tonight, as I outline the next steps we must take as a country, we must honestly acknowledge the circumstances we inherited." Perversely, these are the very facts which give a lie to what he hopes to accomplish, given his failure to consider any but rightist proposals for societal improvement: "Ninety-four million Americans are out of the labor force. Over 43 million people are now living in poverty, and over 43 million Americans are on food stamps. More than 1 in 5 people in their prime working years are not working. We have the worst financial recovery in 65 years. In the last 8 years, the past Administration has put on more new debt than nearly all other Presidents combined.” To boot, “we have inherited a series of tragic foreign policy disasters.”

Much of which Trump criticizes could be said by a radical, on unemployment and a consequent maldistribution of wealth, except that his premise for constructing and justifying the criticism is the near-irrefragable principle (to him) of privatization, the self-evident goal in displacing the welfare and/or regulatory functions of government. We have no assurance that each problem he cites would not fare still worse under his aegis. He even calls at this point for bipartisan cooperation in advancing his agenda: solving the foregoing, “and so many other pressing problems, will require us to work past the differences of party. It will require us to tap into the American spirit that has overcome every challenge throughout our long and storied history.”

With that flourish, we now, but briefly, find the emphasis on antigovernment privatization: “But to accomplish our goals at home and abroad, we must restart the engine of the American economy [as though it was in the hands until now of nefarious socialists]—making it easier for companies to do business in the United States, and much harder for companies to leave.” To sugar the pot, Trump adds: “Right now, American companies are taxed at one of the highest rates anywhere in the world [a dubious assertion]. My economic team is developing historic tax reform that will reduce the tax rate on our companies so that they can compete and thrive anywhere and with anyone. [Fortress America is not the abandonment of foreign markets. Autarky here has an expansive dimension of growth.] At the same time, we will provide massive tax relief for the middle class. We must create a level playing field for American companies and workers.” Both workers and the middle class provide buffers against the government’s getting too close in the regulation of these companies.

Complaining about high tariffs placed on American goods, yet “when foreign companies ship their products into America, we charge them almost nothing,” Trump, using Harley Davison (“they proudly displayed five of their magnificent motorcycles, made in the USA, on the front lawn of the White House”) for illustration, he lambastes other countries for their protective tariff, proclaiming: “I believe strongly in free trade but it also has to be FAIR TRADE [caps in the original transcript].” By now his message is clear: the wall to protect against immigrants is analogous to the wall sealing America from global restrictions by its aggressive business and military leaders, this through leaping over economic battlements without fear of retaliation.

He wants the adoption of a merit-based system of immigration, infrastructural improvement, citing Eisenhower’s record on the interstate highway system, and, on rebuilding, the observance of two principles: Buy American, and Hire American. This he attaches to what is quite different: “Tonight, I am calling on this Congress to repeal and replace Obamacare with reforms that expand choice [privatization], increase access, lower costs, and at the same time, provide better Healthcare. None of these is, or will be, shown for likely adoption. Of course, instead, again privatization: “Mandating every American to buy government-approved health insurance was never the right solution for America. [That compulsory in practice?] The way to make health insurance available to everyone is to lower the cost of health insurance, and that is what we will do.... One third of counties have only one insurer on the exchanges—leaving America with no choice at all. Remember when you were told that you could keep your doctor, and keep your plan? We now know that all of those promises have been broken.” Not a word on the public option or single-payer system, which would go a long way to correcting the present high costs and his other complaints, freedom of choice, another barrier, ideological in nature, to prevent direct government involvement.

Trump is impatient. On health care, he says: “Obamacare is collapsing—and we must act decisively to protect all Americans. Action is not a choice—it is a necessity.” He presents a five-part plan, in scrapping the existing system never mentioning the privatization route by name, and he does this with a plea for bipartisan cooperation, which, for Democrats, surrenders what little there is worth retaining. Hence, he says: “I am calling on all Democrats and Republicans in the Congress to work with us to save Americans from this imploding Obamacare disaster.” A private system is the watchword, so that, on point one, the movement to that status is clear from his demand that Americans with pre-existing conditions have access to coverage [implying a transfer of coverage], and that we have a stable transition [again implying a transfer from public to private] for Americans currently enrolled in the healthcare exchanges.” Second, more specific, “we should help Americans purchase their own coverage, through the use of tax credits and expanded Health Savings Accounts—but it must be the plan they want, not the plan forced on them by the Government.” (One might see Trump’s thinking revolving around the fetishism of choice, except that “choice” is coded to indicate the correct direction.) Third, “we should give our great State Governors the resources and flexibility they need with Medicaid to make sure no one is left out.” That is, sacrifice Medicaid to the states entirely, the likelihood of adequate coverage for all problematic. Fourth, afford the medical profession absolute protection against malpractice and other suits—patients, like workers and the middle class, a barrier to taking effective action, and fifth, provide direct assistance to the health insurance industry, allowing companies to cross state lines—“creating a truly competitive national marketplace [once more sanctioning the private] that will bring cost way down and provide far better care.”

Introducing from the gallery another guest, a young woman who at 15 months had contracted “a rare and serious illness,” whose father “founded a company to look for a cure, and helped develop the drug that saved Megan’s life.” She is now 20. What is interesting is the use made of a purely human interest story—a criticism of the Food and Drug Administration for not hastening the review process in evaluating the safety of drugs: “If we slash the restraints, not just at the FDA but across our Government, then we will be blessed with far more miracles like Megan.” This of course applies to regulation in general, a persnickety federal government gumming up the works, inconsistent with—as in coal—the dismantling of government by the new forces in Washington.

And in a neat quarter turn to a pressing subject on the regulatory front—the survival of public education—Trump, as in his selection of DeVos as education secretary, throws himself four-square on several alternative possibilities all on the private side of the ledger. On the offering of choice, and using blacks and Latinos as enticement for his plan, he states: “I am calling upon Members of both parties to pass an education bill that funds school choice for disadvantaged youth, including millions of African-American and Latino children. These families should be free to choose the public, private, charter, magnet, religious or home school that is right for them.” In politicizing school education—quite a menu of choices—Trump has thechutzpah of wrapping schools in a context of civil rights, perhaps calculated to resonate among liberals (to the sacrifice of public education), for as he says preceding the list: “Education is the civil rights issue of our time.”

More guests are recognized, each supporting one of Trump’s talking points. One, Denisha, “failed third grade twice.... [b]ut then she was able to enroll in a private center for learning, with the help of a tax credit and scholarship program.” Then came remarks on violence, the murder rate in Chicago, and the need for cooperation with and respect for the police: “We must build bridges of cooperation and trust—not drive the wedge of disunity and division.” This is well put, although he sentimentalizes the topic bringing it into line with the tenor of his law-and-order self-created mandate: “We must support the incredible men and women of law enforcement.” And to drive home the dangers out there (immigrant scare?) he states, “I have ordered the Department of Homeland Security to create an office to serve American Victims. The office is called VOICE—Victims of Immigrant Crime Engagement,” a prejudgment further enflaming the populace when it comes on board. Then, not through, he introduces four more guests from the gallery, victims, themselves or a loved one, of crime. The emphasis on crime and violence suddenly introduces him, as though related, to the virtues of a strong military.

Brief and to the point: “Finally, to keep America Safe we must provide the men and women of the United States military with the tools they need to prevent war and—if they must—to fight and win. I am sending the Congress a budget that rebuilds the military, eliminates the Defense sequester [that which sets it apart], and calls for one of the largest increases in national defense spending in American history.” There is to be more for veterans in the package: “Our veterans have delivered for this Nation—and now we must deliver for them. The challenges we face as a Nation are great. But our people are even greater. And none are greater or braver than those who fight for America in uniform.”

He then uses the death of Navy SEAL Ryan Owen, his “legacy etched into history,” although there remains doubt about the efficacy of the raid, to assert: “To those allies who wonder what kind of friend America will be, look no further than the heroes who wear our uniform.” Coming from on high, already to dissuade critics of policy, here foreign policy, Trump softens—for home political consumption—his Fortress America idea, first conceding little, “Our foreign policy calls for a direct, robust and meaningful engagement with the world. It is American leadership based on vital security issues that we share with our allies across the globe.” Next, he gives, contrary to his recent record, qualified support to NATO: “We strongly support NATO.... But our partners must meet their financial obligations. And now, based on our very strong and frank discussions, they are beginning to do just that.”

Acknowledging his nationalist (from what just preceded, nationalism itself is code for the corporate-militarist paradigm) deeply-embedded viewpoint, Trump announces: “We will respect historic institutions, but we will also respect the sovereign rights of nations.... My job is not to represent the world. My job is to represent the United States of America. But we know that America is better off, when there is less conflict—not more.” Let’s leave matters at that; he does not let go of dramatizing the high ground: “Think of the marvels we can achieve if we simply set free the dreams of our people.” Setting free, liberating, follow from reducing the intervention of government in the people’s lives. Why not proclaim victory, given the moral virtue of America? He outlines the factors in part composing America’s greatness: “This is our vision. This is our mission. But we can only get there together. We are one people, with one destiny. We all bleed the same blood. We all salute the same flag. And we are all made by the same God.’

Trump wants Americans to Think Big, capitalist in inspiration, a vital private sector buttressed by taking regulation off the table, venerating and appreciating the contribution being made for all of us by successful men of business, and possessing armed might second to none. I see fascism in the spirit and substance of the harmonious relations between capitalism and the state, found in earlier administrations going back, but now reaching a tipping point to seemingly irreversible structural-ideological trends under Trump. Without wishing to sound cryptic, I believe being is becoming, that is, the present context of power is rapidly progressing into a new political reality, a state having the makings of authoritarianism, which foretells the future—its petrification—of democracy. The military neatly tucked into more pacific concerns, I have sought to point out some of the contradictions in Trump's speech.

MARCH 8, 2017

Evisceration of Freedom: Surgical Authoritarianism

America in self-flagellation, though seemingly at the apex of power and virtue in the world, supinely bows to the Maximum Leader, less out of guilt, than out of the need for authoritarian submission, a desire for oneness with, here, Trump to conquer fears about the future, and in need of protection. The attachment is unhealthy; democratic governance inevitably suffers. America is facing a crisis, watching, even participating in, the postponement, weakening, or elimination of regulations affecting health standards, safety, environmental quality, social programs benefiting the poor and disadvantaged, in sum, the dismantlement of the structure and practice of societal welfare in its positive dimensions of public service. The basest instincts of humankind have come to the surface. Self-flagellation is merely a nervous twitch, knowing, if not fully consciously, the wrongs being committed on practically an hourly basis to oneself and one's fellow citizens, nevertheless refusing to change the direction of the polity—a direction on track for the realization of fascism.

There must be comfort in certainty of rectitude, of tapping into the power of those, beginning with Trump, whose prepotency in the social structure invites—draws in—the alienated who want desperately to belong, but also the opportunist seeking a step up the ladder of success. Trump did not single-handedly win a presidential election, and then, in six weeks thus far as president, compile a record of guerrilla warfare against government, all the more striking in that the military-factor had become greatly magnified. This leaves a militaristic spirit drawing sustenance from resentments—to be covered over—because structure and equality had long parted company, and a complementary spirit of nihilism, which translates into the propensity for war, the expectation of international tension, and un-sublimated dreams of hegemony.

But if not single-handed in accounting for his electoral triumph, we must face the reality of the society that elected him, and that to this moment does not, Democratic and even progressive organized party and groups, question an ascending neo-fascist (moving toward consummation) political movement legitimated through office establishing itself in power. The strategy at this still early stage I would call, for now, pointillistic fascism, not as in abstract art, but rather as the concrete placement of, already, hundreds of efforts, points of contact, to hold back or rescind the regulatory function per se of government.

The formula is, strike a thousand blows on the microcosmic level against government intervention (again, absent the military) wherever it can be found, like California's regulation of tailpipe emissions of carbon dioxide, then creating a cumulative build-up to foster a regulation-free environment resulting in a qualitative change better conducive to business consolidation, profit-taking, immunity from prosecution for antisocial deeds and their consequences, and, perhaps indirectly (though not for Trump and the coterie surrounding him), strong encouragement of the military.

It is the seemingly minor violations of human freedom that fail to grab our attention, on which Trump is banking to start the fuller dismantlement of government, but the sheer volume of activity on the lines of non-enforcement, delay, abrogation—using Executive power, instead of turning to Congress—of specific regulation in a myriad of fields that explains what I mean by descriptive characterization of surgical: incisive cutting away or neutralizing of regulation, point-by-point, a pock-marked political-economic landscape, where once guardianship by government was thought a moral obligation fulfilling its purpose. Now, regulation is a hated word in ever-widening circles, whether a propagandistic assault on the senses or the long-term historical cultivation of false consciousness predicated on variations of what was once termed (late 19th century) the Gospel of Wealth.

The anticipated result of Trump's early strategy is movement from the microcosmic to the macrocosmic, beyond a regulation-free social order that, contrary to his pronouncements, objectively leads to social differentiation in terms of wealth, class, and power. Only when the macrocosmic or systemic level is reached, can Reaction be assumed and militarism, amply funded and with ineffectual domestic resistance, be taken for granted as the desirable state of existence.

My point, however, on seemingly minor violations of human freedom requires brief elaboration. They, as in a pointillistic spreadsheet, even when violations are still inchoate, decisively count for the future of a society and coalesce with others. Minor ultimately become major instances of totalitarian abuse, yet at first barely discernible in the larger schema, then, like a spreading cancer, are integrated with the social system as a whole. These violations (we'll see examples below, e.g., the deregulated tailpipe emissions) contribute to a wider context of authoritarianism.

Trump in this respect can be seen to be running wild, firing off executive orders the moment an opportunity for rescindment or the like arises. His lack of restraint (already the rollback of regulations approaches one hundred) appears like a willy-nilly exercise of power when in reality the first six weeks in power have resulted in a concerted, premeditated harm and malevolence greater than at the beginning of any previous presidency.

He is methodical; his actions are well planned, calculated to come together in a unified framework. Ideas, including those generated by Bannon and a small group of advisers, and subjoined to the exercise of power, enable Trump to realize his own long-term antiradicalism and contempt for the truth and restraint of any kind on his dystopian vision of class relations and capital accumulation. The result to date: America, this early in his administration (when precedents are created), can be found on the doorstep of fascism.

Testimony to Trump's neo-fascistic outlook, and that of his close advisers and Cabinet appointments, need not dwell on the obvious, the addition to an already humongous military budget and the round-up of undocumented immigrants for deportation, for I believe it is the multiplicity of small points on the authoritarian compass that better reveals the potentiality of what is transpiring for long-term totalitarianism now emerging. Examples abound in Eric Lipton and Benjamin Applebaum's New York Times article, "Leashes Come Off Wall Street, Gun Sellers, Miners and More." 3-5-17. (The article also appeared under various titles, depending on its location in the paper.) Immediately we see a photograph of the National Rifle Association convention this past

May in Louisville. The caption reads: “The gun-rights group lobbied [successfully it turns out] against a rule that would have effectively prevented most people with disabling mental illnesses from purchasing firearms.” The foot in the door, other measures such as affecting lead-based bullets (no longer banned) came under review, a similar narrative for breaking open the regulatory framework the length and breadth of society.

As for example, that of the carbon-dioxide emitting tailpipes, we see no end to the process of deregulation. Government is being brought to a standstill. Coral Davenport, writing in The Times, “Trump to Undo Vehicle Rules That Curb Global Warming,” 3-3, (roll-back our operative term), states: “The Trump administration is expected to begin rolling back stringent federal regulations on vehicle pollution that contributes to global warming.... [A joint announcement is expected from EPA administrator Scott Pruitt and transportation secretary Elaine Chao this week.] The regulatory rollback on vehicle pollution will relax restrictions on tailpipe emissions of carbon dioxide and [significantly] will not require action by Congress.”

Davenport adds, “The E.P.A. will also begin legal proceedings to revoke a waiver for California that was allowing the state to enforce the tougher tailpipe standards for its citizens.” What’s wrong with America? Has the country gone berserk in eliminating more stringent protective standards for its people? Capitalism has thrown America to the wolves. The tail (automakers) wags the dog (the nation), the former complaining that producing a greater proportion of electric and hybrid models, and reaching higher fuel-efficiency standards, constitutes, particularly for the larger automakers, “technical requirements too burdensome.”

The examples of regulatory dismantlement pile one on top of another in never ceasing flow. Hence, “Verizon and AT&T will not,” Lipton and Applebaum write, “have to take ‘reasonable measures’ to ensure that their customers’ Social Security numbers, web browsing history and other personal information are not stolen or accidentally released.” So much for privacy. Nor another case in point, “Wall Street banks like Goldman Sachs and JPMorgan Chase will not be punished, at least for now, for not collecting extra money from customers to cover potential losses from certain kinds of high-risk trades that helped unleash the 2008 financial crisis.” It all gets perhaps worse and certainly more voluminous: “more than 90 regulations that federal agencies and the Republican-controlled Congress have delayed, suspended or reversed,” tallied by The Times, in this short time, echoing Bannon’s much-quoted boast of “the deconstruction of the administrative state,” an epithet of course in these circles.

The writers note, without exaggeration: “The emerging effort—dozens of additional rules could be eliminated in the coming weeks—represents one of the most significant shifts in regulatory policy in recent decades.” My take: Government by stealth. Although Trump, Bannon, and company are hardly innocent bystanders to these developments, one must not overlook the (agreeable) role of outside—truly inside—pressure: “In many cases, records show that the changes came after appeals by corporate lobbyists and trade association executives, who see a potentially historic opportunity to lower compliance costs and drive up profits. [Not all is abstract ideology] Slashing regulations, they argue, will unleash economic growth.”

This is the hidden history of American capitalist development brought now up to date and perhaps extended: “On a near daily basis, regulated industries are now sending in specific requests to the Trump administration for more rollbacks, including recent appeals from 17 automakers to rescind an agreement to increase mileage standards for their fleets, and another from pharmaceutical industry figures to reverse a new rule that tightens scrutiny over the marketing of prescription drugs for unapproved uses.”

In truth, this is Corporate Anarchism, under the watchful and solicitous eye of the Trump administration. One can speak here of capitalism on a roll, or capitalism’s rape of America—your choice, or both. Here is Thomas Donohue, president of the US Chamber of Commerce: “After a relentless, regulatory onslaught that loaded unprecedented burdens on businesses and the economy, relief is finally on the way.” As the writers observe, “The regulatory retrenchment is unfolding on multiple fronts.”

And relief certainly is on the way: “Congress, with Mr. Trump’s approval, has erased three Obama-era rules in the last month, lifting regulations relating to coal mines and oil and gas exploration, as well as the sale of guns to the mentally ill.” “More than 25 additional rules” are in the pipeline, “with the House having already voted to eliminate nearly half of them.” Nor is Trump quiescent in the matter: he “has separately signed executive orders directing agencies to pursue the reversal of other rules, including a requirement that financial advisers act in the interest of their clients, and a rule aimed at protecting drinking water from pollution.”

We are, from these and other examples, staring in the face of political evil. One must confront the large changes contemplated, as in mounting a full-scale deportation affecting millions, or building the continent-wide wall to control immigration, but while looking at the big examples one must not ignore the executive and congressional pinpricks, actions in which the scalpel is cutting away more specific regulations as seen above. These latter are making their way forward to structural prominence, and by accretion, are coming to define a New Order.

It is as though the wall and deportation are diversions, so as to allow detailed movement on so many other fronts. The reporters again: “New White House appointees at agencies,” as, e.g., the FCC, SEC, Interior, and EPA, “have also personally intervened in recent weeks to block, delay or start the process to nullify other rules, such as a requirement that corporations publish tallies comparing chief executive pay with average employee wages.” Nothing is too large or too small to toss into the antiregulatory hopper.

Trump means business—literally: The administration “has also imposed a broad regulatory freeze, instructing agencies to delay the adoption of any rules not already in effect, and to consider whether those rules should be targeted for elimination.” Lipton-Applebaum continue this paradigm of Executive usurpation, in which the object is to strike regulations, but also strengthen the role and powers of the presidency within all of government: “And, through yet more executive orders [the obvious by-passing or downgrading of Congress in what remains essentially the center of gravity in the law-making process], it [the administration] has set up barriers to enact any new regulations—such as a requirement that for each new rule, at least two others must be identified for repeal—and ordered every federal agency to create a team of employees to look for more rules that can be eliminated.”

Trump turns the popular adage about the power of positive thinking on its head, negativity a reigning premise in the operation and organization of the state in its moral obligation to serve the needs of the people. The meanness and pettiness of the new Washington is not unlike what

Reagan's administration, the reporters remind us, had earlier attempted to accomplish; it "tried to rescind a rule requiring airbags in passenger vehicles."

Lastly, for the antiregulatory examples come at a faster rate, once started, than can be counted, they write: "The administration started its campaign against regulation on the afternoon of Inauguration Day, with a memo from Reince Priebus, Mr. Trump's chief of staff, instructing agencies to halt work on new regulations and to delay putting completed regulations into effect." One wonders how much Americans were and are aware of the frank make-over of the government and how far this has proceeded. We seem to have created our own Iron Curtain penning us in, as well as keeping others out. That Iron Curtain appears to be fast descending.

Government is practically brought to a standstill, from the standpoint of its transformative and ameliorative functions. There are delays as a result of the order, which includes "a measure intended to prevent potentially toxic formaldehyde exposure in homes caused by certain furniture products," becoming operable. The Trump inner circle is a menace not only to good government, but government per se: creeping, before galloping, fascism.

MARCH 13, 2017

The Rape of Modern America: Example, Forced Resignation of US Attorneys

Trump has called for the forced resignation of all 46 US Attorneys for the nation as a whole, as reported by Weiser and Rashbaum, in the New York Times (3-11-17), and most notably, that of Preet Bharara, the US Attorney in Manhattan, facetiously, the Sovereign District of New York. I will not go into these and other forced resignations among those who had served under Obama, except to designate them for what they are: a political lynching, or better yet, the legitimization of arbitrary rulings under the cover of executive authority, in either case, against what democratic societies have traditionally regarded as safeguards to supremacy of the legal fabric of society. All of that is changing rapidly, an egg with the yolk sucked out, leaving only repression in its place.

Trump will have his way, no matter what, whether wholesale deportations, or, wholesale firings (the more cynical the explanations, the more crushing the defeat of the opposition—and ultimately effective the restraint of the protest. Trump has gauged America well. It bends or breaks, even to the exhibition of power. Inflexibility, in the name of patriotism and supposed class interest, allows a working class already disposed to complicity with ruling groups to seek higher esteem in the grand rankings of fascism than to make a stand, increasingly solitary in character, that obstructs the design of an integrated state formation, business and government, together with the insertion of the military factor into a dynamic system of order, hierarchy, and a polity whose irrefutable future lies with accommodation to, and subscription in, a fascistic mode of status-guarantees having ideological implications for what we have escaped thus far: the vulnerable exposure of dissent to the pressures of thought control, and—except for the prison system—the rising proportion of minorities and the poor both in and out of that system. One does not need icebergs to make a gulag.

Knowing Trump is sufficient as a ticket of admission, with a new staff at Justice now clearing the slate for the necessary candidates. Soon, anti-terrorism will no longer be sufficient in selection of a likely conviction (and for starters, natural-born citizens, although the charge, loosely cast, will go a long way to preparing the ground for illegal deportation or long-term incarceration. Once the system of law has been attacked, there is very little society can do to prevent future violations. To know, is ample reason for suppression, widening outward to seeking what Paul Robeson might have called a stand-up-kind-of-a-guy, marked for exposure, censure, outright denunciation and perhaps extermination. America did this not long ago in Chile (some of the same enforcers of US policy no doubt involved). The contagion is widespread, and is to be expected from such a condition. Contagion—Webster's—a corrupting influence or contact, is where a compromise of the immune system already has led in capitalism to a weakening of the body politic, cancer rushing in to fill the vacuum. Its commodification has become a half-step to alienation, here, the divorcement of means and ends, treating the human being as an object rather than subject, in a world of similarly placed objects, thereby encouraging power and manipulation all the more than if the social order were organized on strict democratic lines.

Perhaps it is too late, in historical-sociological terms, for America to be organized on these lines. At least insofar as Trump is concerned, America has entered unknown territory, not only a victim of its own hubris (sans retribution), but also, a victim of its ideological rigidity in facing problems so deeply entrenched in its mentality, like striving to overcome under-consumption and the declining rate of profit, that it throws up its arms in trying for their solution. Actually, retribution becomes understandable because of this rigidity: punishment and reward alike a means of achieving psychological balance, the result the freezing into place a status quo which postpones the very solutions favorable to socialism yet inimical to the long-term interests of capitalism. America has chosen its way, as has much of the world following in its wake. One does not have to subscribe categorically to the present course to recognize its deficiencies as an alternative model of modernization. Force is morally bankrupt; so is the commodity, and with it surplus value, as the central organizing principle of society (which it is, under an unflinching view of commodity's meaning in its epistemological dimension, and not applicable to profit alone).

Trump, verily, is an agent of death, if by death one means to press forward in structural ways the signification of its own negation; it negates its opposite, life in its myriad forms tokening the affirmation of itself, its valuing of human dignity and rights in the face of the odds favorable to regimentation, consensus, acquiescence. With that, I return to the Times article noted before, Benjamin Weiser and William Rashbaum's "With Preet Bharara's Dismissal, Storied Office Loses Its Top Fighter," who "made a name for himself as one of the nation's most aggressive and outspoken prosecutors of public corruption and Wall Street crime." Bharara, like the others, was told to vacate his position, which, as of this writing, he refused to do, he alone, at least publicly, of the stalwart "46" thus refusing.

Indeed, for Bharara, this was more than holding on to a job. (He had far more to lose than to gain from taking this position, preferment given the cold shoulder in the face of supposed inadequacy, ingratitude, or disobedience.) In fact, he was working on several high-profile cases, affecting adversely Governor Cuomo and Mayor de Blasio's record in office, as well as "Sheldon Silver, the former Democratic speaker of New York's Assembly, and Dean G. Skelos, the former Republican majority leader of the State Senate." As the last testifies, he was not partisan in his prosecution of members of both parties when the occasion warranted. That attitude combined with his established integrity and intellectual and rhetorical skills made him seemingly unfit for his post, an expected defensive strategic position in protection of his superiors. Trump was fully acquainted with his record, and yet persisted in pushing him out, the one-case-fits-all mode of action, or policy rationale, hardly consistent with rule of law doctrine and practice.

Trump looks bad any way you slice it; the de Blasio case, now far advanced, and perhaps more promising than the others, comes at the time when the reporters acknowledge, “And with the mayor gearing up for his re-election campaign ... his lawyers are pressing prosecutors to conclude the investigation or, they say, risk affecting the election’s outcome.” Add to his potential for doing harm to the governing classes, Bharara’s stewardship, seen through a de Blasio filter, “was also known for its insider trading investigations, civil rights cases and terrorism prosecutions,” an altogether estimable record. As of Friday night, he saw himself as not severed from the appointment, and free—he told him—to pursue “the work as we have done it, independently, without fear or favor for the last seven years.” Bharara gets the last word: “[If there is a] ‘credible whiff that justice has been politicized, there’s nothing worse than that.’”

Saturday, March 11, the day after he made his stand, refusing to resign, and “to immediately clean out” his office, he announced that he was fired. There was no explanation or justification offered on the decision, simple as that. A Justice Department spokesperson stated, “I can confirm [he] is no longer the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York.” The reporters further observe: “All presidents choose their own appointees” for these positions and “almost always ask those from their predecessors to leave.” But the clincher defining this story is that under Trump “the process ... was unusually abrupt, and it was yet another rocky encounter between the Trump administration and the nation’s law enforcement apparatus.” What can one say here? The more purposeful the action taken (and not returning calls to clarify policy, seemingly negative, is instead an active, cohesive, coherent policy, even if a stall technique), the more destructive the action and its consequences.

Too, remaining with the givens here, can it be said that Trump remains an enigma, or more, an adherent of conspiracy-theory strategy and thinking, when preparations were made earlier for a clean sweep of ideology and politics? I believe not. For proponents of policy, starting with a hands-on active president, hence showing determination on a local scale of operations, one singles out Bannon, etc., in what appears a mentally-binding adversarial context, confrontation would seem to follow naturally, these proponents therefore not political imbeciles or cretins. When capitalism is thought to be attacked, counter-attack is regarded as feasible and expected. The clean sweep, presumably hanging in the balance, has already taken a Rightward course, the Right a new political locus for what was once ideological Centrism. Beyond that, we must wait and see.

MARCH 17, 2017

America Becomes Fascist: Trump Revealed

Trump is the real thing. His budget proposal, now made public, is perfectly expected, an increase of 10% for military spending, 7%, homeland security, 6%, veterans, and the largest cuts, -31% EPA, -29% State department and development agencies, -21% agriculture. This of course tells us little about the deformation of government allocations and still less about overall purpose. On its face, we see militarism crushing down government’s welfare functions, and this should be a clue as to what’s at stake.

As NYT reports, “The proposal would also eliminate funding [I stress, eliminate] for nearly 20 smaller independent agencies, including the National Endowment for the Arts, the National Endowment for the Humanities, the Corporation for Public Broadcasting and the Legal Services Corporation, which finances legal aid groups.” The list (more below) is instructive. The reason is given to be, avoiding deficits while increasing the defense budget necessitates pruning the tree. The preeminence of defense requires nothing less, if the Homeland is to remain safe. Trump is the ultimate protector of American democracy and freedom.

At a minimum, from recent polls, 40% of the American public buys in—totally and completely, as the response to Trump’s speeches make clear, with probably another 20% on the borderline, sharing the nativist biases and xenophobic fears. This leaves a scant 40% as an opposition force (and even there, a Democratic party weak, patriotism-saturated, hardly confrontational with standards of contemporary political discourse, as on defense per se, the Cold War, toleration of dissent). In this case, predisposition to fascism, a uniform political-cultural trend since the end of World War Two, renders Trump practicable, intelligible, and for a near-majority of the public desirable. Fascism as a top-down affair cannot succeed without the underlying groundwork of receptivity.

Nevertheless, Trump has crossed the Rubicon, a recipient of history in America but also self-propelled in taking over. A healthy America never would have tolerated his advancement and acquiescence in his ideas. For they are harsh, repulsive to a democratic sensibility and belief-system, one-dimensional in the veneration of stripped-down national power combined with, and meaningless without, unrestrained capitalism, achievable by whatever means. That alone qualifies for consideration of fascism, not simply the militarist cum monopoly capital core of society, but the underlying means for achievement, the interpenetration of government and business as the polity’s defining mode.

America since 1945 has overstressed expansion, both geopolitical and market-oriented, as much co-responsible for the inception of the Cold War as the Soviet Union, and with the Korean War (which came remarkably early, 1950), its leading architect and beneficiary, so that by Vietnam, anticommunism, the operative catchword all those years, had been fully actualized as the move for unilateral dominance. This has not changed, the impulse only intensified in the interim. Perhaps instability and under-performance are integral to advanced capitalism, yet something more sinister is involved, a self-fulfilling motivation—a preservation-instinct (?)—which transcends economic ambitions and political fears, directed to a hardening personality structure contemptuous of, even frightened of—human needs and feelings. This corresponds to the requisite mindset sanctioning attitudes toward war, fortress-building, intolerance, and setting America straight on the course of global counterrevolution, none of which would be existing, possible, acceptable under an authentic expression of political-economic freedom.

I would like to look here at the proposed budget, for it indicates my thesis: beyond militarism and capitalism, but deriving from their consequent integration in today’s America, there is an eradicated disposition, absolutistic in character, to eliminate all traces of presumed softness (as defined by a growing majority, including, regrettably, the working class) from American life, that which pertains to peace, reduction of class differences thereby approaching a condition of equality, realization of respect for the individual, at bottom, an ethos of caring through meeting the health needs, as a matter of right, of society's members, broadly interpreted beyond decent jobs and housing to the environmental well-being, protection, replenishment of the planet.

America is in the forefront of its desecration. My concern is not the big-ticket items, which are transparent to all, starting with the military, encouragement of capital accumulation, and the weakening of EPA, but the microscopic items, which are a telling guide to the settling mood of antihuman deep-seated conviction. Even the meager list thus far: why eliminate NEA or NEH unless the intuitive fear of reaching a true flourishing human identity has taken hold? I once more than a half-century ago wrote an essay for Agricultural History entitled "Fear of Man." Add to that "Woman," as at bottom the fear of human emancipation from the thralldom of institutionalized repression, glaringly evident in the machinery of foreign and domestic policy, and you have the picture: a vindictiveness toward anyone or anything not only threatening but also questioning the established verities, imperialism and extreme wealth-differentiation.

Let's look closer at this nihilistic (denial of any objective ground of moral truths, destruction as desirable for its own sake, definitions offered by Webster's Collegiate) mindset, as it translates into Trump's proposed budget, the hatred of human potentiality wherever humankind, and here America in particular, becomes awakened, realized, or even begins to rear its head. EPA is easy in the account: elimination of one-fifth of the agency's personnel, funding for the Clean Power Act, and climate change research. What kind of small mind tears apart what is beneficial to society, down to research? On State and development programs, we see in The Times chart and explanation, an attack on the UN: "Climate change initiatives ... would lose all their U.S. funding," other programs manhandled, as meanwhile "Israel's $3.1 billion in annual military aid would be untouched."

And so on (again, NYT throughout for information). Agriculture—I stress the vicious cutting out of humanly-deserving programs, here a reduction in the National Forest System and elimination of "loan and grant programs for water and sewage systems." Next, Labor: scaling back "on a number of job training programs, including those aimed at helping seniors, disadvantaged young people and unemployed Americans." Justice: budget cutting (-$4B), "even as he [Trump] steps up border enforcement, hires more immigration judges and slightly increases the F.B. I. budget." Here things become grizzly from any democratic standpoint, Health and Human Services: "eliminating $4.2 billion in community service programs like the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program," and cuts of 18% to the National Institutes of Health, in both of these cases, needing a mad Dr. Frankenstein with sharpened scalpel to ferret out such cuts.

Commerce, like the others, fares poorly: "The budget eliminates the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's grants and programs for coastal and marine management, research and education and eliminates the Minority Business and Development Agency, which supports minority-owned businesses." Education: emphasis on school-choice programs, "while eliminating funding for before- and after-school and summer programs," along with eliminating "the Federal Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant" for college students "with the greatest need for financial aid," a further instance, if one were needed, for contempt shown the poor—and designed to make them remain that way. Transportation: initiating "privatization of the nation's air traffic control operations," as well as reducing subsidies to Amtrak.

The list is long and suggests a thoroughness leaving little untouched that benefits the public, a merciless dissection on Trump's part (I use him as responsible, but much of this is scraping the barrel of reactionary figures, in every case favorable administrators, appointed for that reason, and expected to follow in the same vein as the butchering of social welfare continues). Thus, pointedly, Housing and Urban Development: “The budget would eliminate the Community Development Block Grant Program, which funds local improvement efforts and anti-poverty programs, and cut funding for rental assistance and homeownership programs and affordable housing initiatives.” Interior, simplicity itself: “increase funding for programs that drill for oil and gas on public lands and cut funding for programs such as the National Heritage Areas and the National Wildlife Refuge Fund.”

All to increase funding for the military? Of course, but also, as the examples testify, the urge to despoil, ruin, pillage, liberate the darkness of vitriol built-up through the institutional influence and development of war, intervention, militarism, and the fragmentation of human feeling (alienation) associated with capitalism. Energy: some budget cutting, but “an increase of $1.4 billion, or 11 percent, to the National Nuclear Security Administration, which is focused on managing the nation’s nuclear weapons arsenal.” (Hardly a peaceful pursuit.) In addition, “the budget would cut or eliminate programs to support research of breakthrough clean energy technology....” Treasury: the IRS would be “the main target,” although I should have liked more coverage to taxation and fiscal policies. Veterans Affairs: a hefty 6% increase, as in extending the Veterans Choice Program (choosing options outside V.A. facilities).

And finally, Homeland Security and Defense. The former is cut-and-dried: $2.6B for “border security and technology, including the early stages of a wall between the United States and Mexico.” There would be a budget set aside for more Border Patrol agents and Immigration and Customs Enforcement personnel. Also, “another $1,5 billion would go toward supporting the detention and removal of illegal immigrants.” And the latter, faced with a budgetary increase of $52.3B, The Times throws up its arms in despair of accurately enumerating, the increase being still left vague by Trump. What is not vague, however, is the drift of policy making. In every case, America is internally stripped down, impoverished of its national heritage. To say, this is all for the sake of budget balancing (the better to serve military needs) is only partially true; what we are witnessing as well is a punitive thirst, the urge to punish, even among large portions of the population struggling in present economic circumstances, and wholly in defiance of their objective class interests, i.e., punishment for being a free people.

MARCH 20, 2017

Two Nations: Skid Rows vs. Mar-a-Lago

We are becoming an Inverted Republic (if still a republic), wealth concentrating upward in unprecedented proportion to the remainder of society, the downward plunge in social stratification following suit. A tale of two nations: One is comprised of hundreds of thousands of homeless; several more million individuals, ranging from those barely able to avoid homelessness, struggling below or at the poverty line, to the condition of the working poor, facing imperfect employment; until one comes to the much vaunted middle class, much of which, in truth, is just making do.

Set against this, we find the Great Contrast, a very small number of the American Elite, at 1/10 to one percent of the population, joined to a surprising extent—as witness Trump’s ability to fill out Cabinet positions—of cohesion as a bona fide ruling group. The inversion occurs because all resources (capital accumulation, every conceivable avenue for profit maximization) are siphoned upward, leaving a political economy grounded in luxury for some, privation for many, and now a government determined to perpetuate and widen the cleavage. As is often remarked, Trump's chief supporters (aside from the very rich) are in short order going to feel the pain of his ideas, policies, actions—demonstrably aimed at creating a class-state through the sacrifice of working-people's necessities and interests.

I begin with Michael Paarlberg's article in The Guardian (Mar. 17), "Trump's Budget: the dream of a paranoid strongman and a vicious Scrooge." One sentence illuminates the whole picture: "Taken as a whole, Trump's [budget] proposal points to an increasingly paranoid strongman who sees budgets as tools to reward friends and punish enemies, the military as a personal ornament, and poor Americans as piggy banks for his boondoggles and vanity projects." The writer adds, "This doesn't even cover the wall, which would cost enough to pay for the NEA [National Endowment for the Arts] for the next 146 years." Apropos the latter, eliminating the NEA pays for one F-35. Also, Paarlberg's first sentence needs correction, in that, for Trump, the military is more than "a personal ornament." We thus far play down or refuse to come to grips with the vast defense (?) program Trump authorizes, not as an ornament but an aggressive instrument of war, intervention, geopolitical influence, forcible marketing arrangements etc. America First and Fortress America become synonymous, integrated through military power.

I am indebted to The Guardian for its coverage of the US, a non-radical source with open eyes, not afraid to speak the truth. Thus, we note Alastair Gee's article, "Entire homelessness agency could be eliminated by Trump's budget cuts" (Mar. 16), in which he points out "the elimination of the U.S. Interagency Council (Usich)." Paranoia, social depravity, sadism, cruelty, all of these come into play and are revealed when one sees how far the fanaticism of the Assault on the Poor has already proceeded. Billions are being cut from the budget of the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD), "which helps provide low-income housing." The total cut to HUD would be $6.2B from last year, or 13 per cent. Meanwhile, by the most authoritative account thus far undertaken (and it is doubtful others will follow), one night in 2016, when the study was made, 550,000 people experienced homelessness.

But let's look closer. The study, supported by the Gates Foundation, found 549,928 homeless, duly reported to Congress. Investigators, however, are in agreement that this grossly underestimates the homeless, easy to overlook, difficult to count. The strategy of not being arrested, or simply, fear of being discovered or feeling a loss of self-esteem, has created a near-invisible underclass in the shadows of civilization. Of those highly visible, and we see blocks of the homeless on sidewalks, in church aisles, in forests and open fields (in Oregon, volunteers, in 10 inches of snow, went out to make a count) , in which the homeless, many of whom must be classified as unsheltered, are in sleeping bags with cardboard boxes over their heads, leantos, abandoned cars, alleys, hardly the location of what I shall be describing momentarily. Lest we forget Usiche, which coordinates the homeless situation over several agencies, its budget, to be eliminated, was a meager $3.5M, which shows the fanaticism in cuts of which I speak, a budget so miniscule, when we are reckoning expenditures of hundreds of billions of dollars—largely for military hardware and war-making capability—by the government.

Much can be added to the above account. Like Usich, Meals on Wheels is also tagged for elimination. Only profound cynicism and a glorious vision of world supremacy could ferret out this miniscule item as well. And then, as reported in The Guardian (Mar. 18), Trump is making cuts in after-school programs: “According to After-school Alliance, 11.3 million children take care of themselves after school.” These programs provide skills, safety, recreation—until the kids are picked up by working parents. In contrast, it’s time now to observe the Other Nation, the Mar-a-Lago Club.

What follows is not my dystopian brush portraying satire and ridicule, but material taken from the Club’s official website. We are greeted: “Welcome to the Mar-a-Lago Club, one of the most highly regarded private clubs in the world. Located within 20 acres of perfectly landscaped gardens with ocean views, Mar-a-Lago is truly the crown jewel of Palm Beach and an acknowledged landmark in the National Register of Historic Places.” (This is where Trump hangs out on weekends.) The description continues: “Members enjoy all of the finest amenities that the club has to offer, from our incredible beach and pool facility, to the spa and fine dining as well as world class entertainment.” (One of the Trump hallmarks, in addition to a Billionaire Cabinet, is the flaunting of wealth, not so much in rhetoric as in conspicuous possessions and consumption. The contrast with the living conditions of the poor and homeless could not be greater—or as I believe, more intentional.)

Mar-a-Lago has been under Trump family ownership since 1985, and the Club itself since ’95. In which “he kept private quarters and all of the elegance that surrounds the property.” The Trump International Golf Club is “a five minute drive away....” (The word “elegance”—get that, you homeless!—occurs several times on the web site, a self-description of superiority, pointedly setting off the differences in power, wealth, station.) Under the heading of “Membership Opportunities,” we find this: “Membership at the club provides the highest privileges and an elite lifestyle reserved for a select few.” (Open admission and praise of a heightened plutocracy would be hard to match, yet waves of adulation bathe over Trump.)

Among the amenities is included “exclusive suites, a state-of-the-art-fitness center, award winning tennis courts, beautiful croquet lawns and an entertainment series which hosts internationally world-renowned talent.” I am warmed by this rest-and-recreation setting for tireless billionaires helping to make America Great Again. As for croquet, which caught my eye, we learn: “Boasting one of the most beautiful lawns in the country, the Mar-a-Lago Club venue will not only challenge both mind and body, but will also add a sense of serenity [along with elegance, serenity is another marker with class connotations] so seldom found in competitive sports.” America’s number one ranked player, John C. Osborn, is its head professional.

Had enough of how the upper one-tenth of one percent lives, a moral chasm indicting America—not only under Trump, but working in this direction for decades—as inviting the formation of fascism? But first we must visit the Boutique (on premises): “The Trump Boutique is nestled in an enclave of serenity [that word again, an escape from the strains of capital accumulation] amidst sheltering palm trees and the spa, salon, and fitness facilities. All products at the Boutique are hand selected with care—plush Frette bathrobes, tee shirts encrusted with Swarovski crystals, aromatic candles, the Trump Signature line of skin care & body products and much more.” He is there, holding court, as I write. Frette bathrobes, Swarovski crystals, how does one not see the depravity of massive wealth, the takeover of America by, in light of the social misery they create, economic criminals of the first water?

Finally, one gasps in viewing the Photo Gallery, Mar-a-Lago a monument to bad taste—the plushness, gilt, decorated panels, flowers, in the lobby. What I take to be the ballroom has chandeliers too numerous to count, the room bathed in wall panels and ceiling in golden splendor. The dining room is worthy of Fountainsbleu. And the spacious bedrooms have balconies overlooking the Atlantic. Alas, we bid fond farewell to a capitalist paradise. The homeless, should they care to drive by, will find the address, 1100 South Ocean Boulevard, Palm Beach, Fla., 33480. Or if they are so inclined, they can first telephone, 521.832.2600, and expect a warm, cordial welcome. I have not the words adequately to express my condemnation of the contrast, and only record that such a society of the homeless and super-rich is presumptive evidence of American fascism, not at some future date but here and now.

MARCH 24, 2017

Militarization of American Fascism: Trump the Usurper

The United States is now moving from Fortress America to a Garrison State. By every conceivable measure, the Trump administration is tearing out the vitals, like an enraged tiger out for blood (for no other reason than destruction of what serves and benefits the citizenry), of a social-welfare and environmentally supportive society. The extent of the destruction is so widespread (never mind the use of a scalpel, we are also talking big time meat cleaver) that it sets the historical clock back decades on government's solemn obligation to guard the interests of the people. But, without underestimating the harm he is doing and has done, the problem is partly just that: previous governments throughout American history, the New Deal largely excepted, have not served the people's interest, and have been in the hands of ruling elites with continuities down to the present moment.

I refer to fascism advisedly. Structurally, we find the interpenetration of Capitalism and the State, or if you wish, more familiarly, business and government, the purpose to integrate parallel structures of power on behalf of profit maximization for the corporate sector at home, market-expansion and aspiration for global financial-industrial-military pre-eminence, basically through unilateral actions, abroad. Beyond structure, however, fascism, is inscribed in the American pattern of historical development since at least the late 19th century. It has meant a monoculture of capitalist saturation which has perpetuated an hierarchical social order aimed at stabilizing a ruling group, however varied over time (depending on the different sectors of the economy enjoying prominence) yet constant as part of the societal formation. Democracy, if by that we mean a central element of equality, is a farce, not even a solemn farce.

I won't attempt here a review of that history, which beginning with the Open Door Policy in the late 19th century ushered in a period of expansion having geopolitical and military significance, followed by Theodore Roosevelt's New Nationalism (with special nods to the House of Morgan and the Battleship Navy), then Woodrow Wilson's internationalism (both internally achieving the rationalization of banking coupled with expansion and counterrevolution), to Obama and what I would term an interventionist ethos, symbolized, for me, by the use of armed drones for purposes of assassination. All in all, America has always, in spite of periods of isolationism, been addicted to imperialism: markets, on a pragmatic basis, but also, ideological concerns for their own sake, as in support of dictators, adamant opposition to revolution, the need, as in Vietnam, mercilessly to crush

The Enemy through napalm, defoliants, and carpet bombing, and no missed opportunity for confrontation with Russia and China.

We are speaking here of the postwar world, not one of Trump's creation, which suggests that continuities exist with his predecessors, and that their taking of such faltering steps toward democratization (if at all) paved the way for his rise—harsh-sounding as that may be. America was ripe for Trump, granted in the sanitized form he presented at the election, but neither, once the picture is clear, has there been sufficient resistance to the minor qualitative leap he has made from the past: a liberalization of fascism (in which the rule of law has generally held, while, nonetheless, the concentration of wealth has rapidly moved forward, parallel to an already vastly oversized military budget and continued business-banking monopolization) to the straight-out militarization of fascism—the genuine article in countless ways, from stripping down the social safety net, to the liberation of the forces of pollution, and with that bringing of America to its knees, rounding up all the budgetary savings and channeling the funds into the military as a supreme, unquestioned good. Trump, the Prussian general, has catapulted over Weimer to become a second Adolph Hitler.

If what I say grates on the ears, I only speak to what I believe is true, namely, that he is a global menace, mobilizing the fascist sentiment that is out there (as in his Louisville speech on March 20, and, in fact, his continued mobilization of, and trying to expand, his base through going on the road to agitate crowds by spewing hate, aggression, and a charisma of caudillismo). To know Trump, regrettably, is to know a significant portion of America, and whether yesterday's polls show declining support for him, the numbers in his favor are alarming and the questions asked do not always reflect underlying attitudes, as in what purports to be anticommunism as a reflex action involving contempt for the poor and other perverted views.

Here I should like to look briefly at Coral Davenport's New York Times article, "Trump Lays Plans to Reverse Obama's Climate Change Legacy" (March 22), nominally narrow-based, the single topic, yet revealing much of the whole in microcosm. She writes that Trump "intends to follow through on his campaign vows to rip apart every element of what the president has called Mr. Obama's 'stupid' policies to address climate change." (Webster's: my reference to usurpation is, in part, to exercise authority wrongfully, especially now when the mobilization of the electorate in the campaign was grounded in his lies and its false consciousness.) Trump's proposed budget "would eliminate climate change research and prevention programs across the federal government and slash the Environmental Protection Agency's budget by 31 percent, more than any other agency." He also ordered Pruitt (who himself denies carbon dioxide has any relation to global warming), EPA administrator, "to revise the agency's stringent standards on planet-warming tailpipe pollution from vehicles"—EPA itself, then Trump meticulously reaching down to complete the devastation. Only small-minded, venomous actions, so characteristic of Nazism, helps explain the totalitarian emphasis, as though a cleansing operation.

Trump is doing everything thus far to withdraw from the Paris Accords to limit global warming, except the formal announcement, torpedoing them, first, by denying the need, and second, by pursuing a host of policies individually and collectively poisoning the atmosphere and heating the planet. But he doesn't care: humankind has no other connection with science, Nature, the environment than bleeding dry the nation and world through unrestrained capitalism and the exhibition of power. Then comes the rewriting and ultimate destruction of the Clean Power Plan, an Obama rule "devised to shut down hundreds of heavily-polluting coal-fired power plants and freeze construction of new coal plants, while replacing them with vast wind and solar farms.” The latter, of course, is pure sissified outreach to please the weak among us, and contrary to Trump’s manly aura of belligerence and thirst for conquest, while the former, as in the Louisville rally, is a sadistic demiurge to despoil everything in sight while eulogizing, and hiding behind the image of, the miner as though the only one involved—not the mega-companies—and on public lands at that. Here Davenport notes, implying the depths of Trump’s despoliation perspective, its gratuitousness, “Economists are skeptical that a rollback of the rules would restore lost coal jobs because the demand for coal has been steadily declining for years.”

Never mind, full speed ahead, even if only for the sake of further pollution. Pruitt, as noted, does not see carbon dioxide as a driver of climate change, but that, perhaps as a test of loyalty to The Leader, is par for the course, while Mulvaney, director of OMB, in justifying Trump’s “proposed cuts to climate change research programs,” had this to say: “As to climate change, I think the president was fairly straightforward: We’re not spending money on that anymore”—neat and tidy (consistent with sharp cuts elsewhere, categorical, the edict handed down, fascistic in spirit and execution). One can see what I mean by sabotaging the Paris Accords. And AG Sessions, by the draft order on eliminating the Clean Power Plan, has requested that “a federal court halt consideration of a 28-state lawsuit against [Trump’s] regulation.” This is typical of Trump’s mounting a full-court press to devastate the opposition and have his own way (my previous reference to “lift[ing] a moratorium on new coal leases on public lands.”

Trump wants the elimination, getting down to the nitty-gritty, of the “budgeting metric known as the social cost of carbon,” which “places a dollar cost on the economic impact of planet-warming carbon dioxide pollution ... costs [which] would be outweighed by the economic benefits of preventing billions of tons of planet-warming pollution.” His order, as well, would rescind Obama’s, “that all federal agencies take climate change into account when considering any form of environmental permitting.” To move from the above discussion, easily extended to cover other sectors of America’s economy and society (eliminating Meals on Wheels, a small detail, sticks out for me of the obvious social cruelty motivating policy), to the militarization of American fascism is puddle-jumping, not a major leap, for the same mindset prevails, an orderly dystopian nightmare founded on base instincts of power, wealth, and status (to which I would add, cruelty for its own sake, and the desire to denigrate and humiliate those who oppose or disagree).

Fascism, here, business-government interpenetration, sharpens and articulates the instinct and glorification of violence within and reinforced by a framework of lethal force applied in furtherance of mutual Capitalism-State objectives. This short-circuits democratic processes and thereby enhances the power of The Leader, in this case, Trump, who is at home in both worlds, Capitalism and the State. I grant the definition is sophomoric, but it says what I want to call attention to, the unwarranted seizure of power (even, at the time, accomplished through election, the power now turned to monstrous ends). Webster’s definition for militarism, “exaltation of military virtues and ideals,” also “a policy of aggressive military preparedness,” both of which fit the Trump administration exactly, carries over directly from a parochial world view which corresponds to the hierarchy, falsification of purpose, essential atavism found in the domestic sphere, as a unitary projection made applicable to both the home-front and abroad.

The dwarfing of all else to the military budget speaks volumes about the true purposes of American society as presently (and it seems for perhaps an eternity to come) organized. The integration of domestic and foreign policy that occurs in Trump's warped mind involves the negative linkage between the two spheres: when he knifes domestic programs and agencies he does so for the express purpose of engineering a military build-up. The obverse (principal surface) of every domestic move is a step toward greater militarism—and a possible step toward war. Similarly, every militaristic influence in society redounds back on domestic attitudes favoring, hierarchy, privilege, superiority, exemption from constraints, and valuing obedience down the social structure to ensure acquiescence and promote false consciousness. In one respect, we can admire Trump's frankness, for instead of taking the Democratic line of guns and butter, to indicate that both can be operable, he straight-out makes the proposition, guns vs. butter, where the nation cannot have both, and the latter necessarily must defer to the former in social value and importance. And as for obedience, it logically and practically goes along with hierarchy.

Finally, I'd like to examine NYT's major study, "Is America's Military Big Enough?," coauthored by Rebecca Lai, Troy Griggs, Max Fisher, and Audrey Carlsen (March 22), which provides at the top an overview of "major elements of the U.S. military." We find 3,476 tactical aircraft, 760 attack helicopters, 93 cruisers, destroyers, and frigates, 10 aircraft carriers, 2, 831 tanks, 450 ICBM launchers, 157 bombers, and I'm sure the list can be expanded. More than enough, with the modernization of the nuclear arsenal, to make the remainder of the world take notice. The utter insanity here is, unlike increases in the past (Trump as we are tired of hearing, but do little about, "has proposed a $54 billion increase in defense spending,") where specific allocations had a defined purpose, the reporters state, as though military increases are for the sake of intimidation at home and abroad, "Mr. Trump has not articulated a new mission that would require a military spending increase. This has left analysts wondering what goals he has in mind."

Stop wondering, the goals are multipronged but center on using the threat of aggression to make America Strong Again. Trump knowingly plays with fire, as though conflict were a test of manhood (or confirmation of nihilism). US military spending totals $596B, exceeding that of the next seven countries combined. That buys a lot: 1.3 M active-duty troops, 865,000 in reserve; 200,000 active troops deployed in over 170 countries; an 11 percent increase in active duty army and marine corps personnel; "around 2,200 fighter jets," with an additional "100 more fighter aircraft to the Air Force; as for fifth generation fighter aircraft, the US is alone in that department (the F-35 is in that classification, slated to receive $400B in expenditures); two new aircraft carriers ("more than half of the world's 18 active aircraft carriers are in the United States Navy;" and on nuclear weapons, Trump told Mika Brzezinski, "let it be an arms race. We will outmatch them at every pass and outlast them all." The salience of the buildup, as the reporters are aware, is that, "as with other spending plans, he [Trump] has not articulated a strategic goal." Probably that is expected, because the purpose is the terrorization of the world to suit America's ambitions.

MARCH 28, 2017

Political Cannibalism: Eating America's Vitals

In a nation that professes to be democratic, the United States, we see, as I write, violations of a fundamental nature. They constitute the substructure, perhaps not yet the Constitutional-legal basis, although certainly the moral basis, for introducing the charge of impeachment directed to Donald Trump. Am I too premature? I have the following charges in mind, in no particular order because they in fact hang together and make for a cohesive whole—conditions and practices which promise to become worse as Trump becomes more emboldened in his actions and encounters less resistance.

Let us start with his framework of government, hierarchical in structural-ideological terms, in which wealth concentration is an acknowledged purpose (telegraphed by the demand for “tax reform” and the appointment of a Billionaire Cabinet). This is not a “people’s government,” which, with the possible exception of the New Deal, has not been the case anyway, and hence, is not an impeachable offense. But at least it could be shouted from the rooftop every moment until the din awakened people to the total inversion of the meaning of democracy. Equality is not enshrined in the Constitution, yet its absence specifically as the result and intent of the society’s functioning should expose the administration to strong criticism as creating still further than the Democrats a class-state (or in fact, a militarized plutocracy).

From structural-ideological hierarchy it is an easy step, and logically related, to militarism, a system built upon command, discipline, issuing and taking orders, amoral standards (which legitimate and justify killing, torture, regime change) all in the name of patriotism. Militarism also refers to the militarization of social values and national identity, which leads to an unmistakable Trump marker: ethnocentrism and xenophobia to be ground into basic policy making and the increasing likelihood of war, Russia or China as which possible candidate not yet determined. Militarism, as itself such an integral factor in fascism, has not begun to exhaust its meaning, for it affects the whole purpose and processes of government. Militarism is meant to bleed the social sector dry, a perfect excuse for destroying the safety net, an avowed purpose of Trump’s candidacy and presidency. The military state ideally repudiates government’s social obligations to its people. Even without authentic democracy in its history, America did not have a moral emptiness at its center.

Now it does. We see this in the proposed budget cuts so as to give more to the military. If still not a violation of the Constitution (except perhaps to a broad interpretation of the general welfare), it will do on the antecedent plane to substantive political discussion in the hope of stimulating greater awareness of the massive disconnect between government and people. Political consciousness is centrally important, and everything now attempted and given priority seeks to break this down, indeed, convert it into a false consciousness closely attached to elite rule, global expansion, and an ethos of follow The Leader. Cut, cut, cut, bring the citizenry to its knees, and expel all others. Maternity care, addiction treatment, the list proceeds as though culled with a sharpened needle, every right-wing hatred brought to the surface. And yet, Trump retains much of his following (notwithstanding recent polls, which themselves imply criticism more than outright disaffection), as though a core constituency is ripe for fascism, if not already there. Trump’s chief adviser, Bannon, a Hitler-figure laying in waiting, is reputed to have through his organization, contacts, and proselytizing, some 26M captive loyal adherents.

Shifting public allocations to the military sphere, coupled with tax cuts calculated to benefit only the wealthy, not only eliminates essential government services, but also serves as a means to redistribute wealth, power, and status—more than already under the Bushes, Clinton, and Obama—to the upper stratum. A Billionaire Cabinet, few with any experience in public service, and each dedicated to destroying the designated sector (the reason for the appointment), again may not be an indictable offense, but loudly proclaims the need for impeachment proceedings, centered, like anarchism, on the deliberate wreckage of government and ruination of the social order. Militarism, cause and consequence of needless human suffering largely for its own sake, is an economic and ideological pretext, beyond working for the overwhelming superiority of weaponry and fighting strength, for achieving the docility and psychological impoverishment of American working people.

Then there is the wall, seemingly a nationalist-isolationist drawing inward, which transmogrifies with its vilification of the immigrant the historical image and reputation of America, while thus hiding behind a Fortress-America ideology, actually pressing for greater intervention in world affairs. Impeachment is here improbable, except for the way the Executive leaves little room for congressional action, not to say, for Trump, a record of unscrupulousness which could lead to intervention and undeclared war. In the examples given, and that omits so much else, what is frightening is the lack of opposition or resistance offered to a one-sided, devious government that disregards elemental principles of the rule of law, civil liberties, uncontested civilian over military authority, and the adoption by society of a sovereign people expressing their will—and that includes their representatives—free from pressures and manipulation. America has become the creature of its upper groups, themselves led by an infinitesimal proportion at the top of the pyramid.

Where will it end? Trump on mental grounds alone should never have become president. He is not to be trusted in moments of crisis, particularly those of his own creation. His arrogance is boundless, which often means the cover-up for personal emptiness or a sense of inferiority. His toughness has no redeeming features, the hard-nosed deal maker a vain person who lives for winning and somewhat crumbles when he doesn't. Play with my marbles, or not at all. His business interests violate the emoluments clause of the Constitution, prohibiting a president from receiving gifts or benefits from a foreign government (a Chinese bank is the biggest tenant at Trump Tower), but although technically a ground, it does not carry the necessary weight for impeachment. Rather, Trump to this point, habitual prevarication and activating a volatile mass in his speaking engagements notwithstanding, stays within constitutional bounds, so that until his true policies and inclinations can be smoked out, which would raise extreme danger for the world at large, hope lies in a militant Democratic party challenging him at every turn (backed by the small "d" democratic crowd on the street and in strikes).

On both counts, the results so far have been disappointing. Nothing can be expected of the Democrats, their latest ploy being to show antagonism to Russia, ideologically, for its own sake, but politically to demonstrate their respectability and patriotism. The party is wholly unworthy of leading America or standing up to fascism. A war or complete severing of ties with Russia on the part of the Trump administration would meet with its approval and exhibit its complicity in mounting a conflict. As for the working class, it in turn, hopefully, with pockets of opposition, has gone over to the side of Reaction, a force for intervention, largely self-marginalized in the fight for social-welfare measures. The early days of the CIO are far over the horizon, the IWW even more so. Deny it if we must, in honor of a democratic vision of America and its potential, but the American worker has ceased to act as a progressive social force, a gauntlet picked up by ordinary people fearing the loss of medical coverage, a public school system, control over pollution, hence, the vast depletion of society's resources now to go instead to the making of war.

Trump is a tyrant, worse, an unthinking one, tied up in his own personal world of glorification, his luxurious lifestyle of weekend golfing, his surrounding himself in the trappings of power, all that makes for a repugnant personality who delights in popular adulation and the ostentatious display of wealth. Mar-a-Lago is the man writ large, comfortable with like-minded individuals who despise the masses, would if they could liquidate the poor (except insofar as needed for serving them), and contributing to every cause prejudicial to humankind. Will the republic survive as we once knew it or at least imagined its possibilities to be?

APRIL 3, 2017

The Filth of Lucre: Trump's Presidency

The American people should rise in condemnation, scorn, ridicule, at what has happened to its government and leadership. Super-wealth has become a political factor in guiding and planning policy, carrying a vision of destruction to the pillars of a democratic society in fulfillment of class interests and selfish contempt for the needs of others. America has never witnessed barbarism of such proportions before, a single-minded obsession with riches, which has been translated into power in a self-enclosed process of capital accumulation via the nymphomaniacal pursuit of opportunity, profit, possessiveness.

Webster's Ninth Collegiate defines filth as, among other things, moral corruption or defilement, and lucre, as monetary gain, a far better moral indictment of Trump's transmogrification of the commonweal than anything offered thus far by the Democrats and the millions of Americans who elected and still praise him. Godliness and riches form an organic bond. Sean Spicer, the White House press secretary, said it best: "I think one of the really interesting things that people are going to see today—and I think it is something that should be celebrated—is that the president has brought a lot of people into this administration, and this White House in particular, who have been very blessed and very successful." It is blessed (Webster's, to hallow or consecrate by religious rite or word; to invoke divine care for) to be successful, conversely, successful to be blessed—a Trumpian self-righteous bowdlerization of humanistic ethics, not to say that of religious values and social teachings.

There is no mathematical algorithm (unfortunately) for judging wealth excessive and injurious to society under a rampant capitalist order (one reason socialism and democratization still tug at the heartstrings of many people in the world), but surely America has set an example of pure evil, much of which had remained undetected until the advent of Trump's presidency, for the individuals involved well after the head-start made. Trump had himself, family, associates, even those known only by reputation, ready-to-hand, to assemble a billionaire's circle to run the government and society. Plutocracy doesn't do it, not strong enough a term: government by the wealthy, a controlling class of the wealthy. We enter, instead, the realm of ECONOMIC FASCISM. Worse still is the ignorance and smugness, generically and literally, the desire to get away with murder, convinced they will never be prosecuted or suffer humiliation.

Economic fascism requires political fascism for its implementation, a structural negation of what governments are expected to do, preserve the transparency of government, ensure the fairness of the legal order, respect the principle of equality in all matters affecting the public—the foregoing merely a bare minimum of the bourgeois state and society, and not even raising the standard of socialism. In fact, long-antedating Trump, and as practiced by both major parties, proto-fascistic tendencies have been long in the making, internationally, evidenced by war, intervention, efforts at regime change, confrontation with Russia, China, and Third World socialism, and contemptuous treatment of climate-change dangers, and domestically, a long list in desecration and denigration of all things placing the needs of the public before and above the needs of capitalism. I include here violations of the right of privacy, a more-than-adequate system of medical care, the safeguarding of the environment, and the allocation of the nation's resources and wealth to improvement of people's well-being, rather than to a military machine insatiable in its demands and, not happenstance, soaking up the social surplus so as to prevent its being plowed back into the needs of society, especially that of the poor, the unemployed, the growing number of homeless.

That is fascism enough, or its excellent starting place, and now, Trump's systemic escalation adds fuel to the fire of suffering while establishing the basis—itsself also long in the making—of economic fascism, a floodgate of vested interests both on their own and taking command of government, appointees who are specialists in tearing down the regulations provided by the agencies and departments they administer: carte blanche for still greater capital accumulation and the spoliation of what they despise, as in the case of the coal industry and climate change. Economic fascism speaks here not simply to the organization of industrial and other fronts, as under Nazism, but, antitrust a dead letter in any case, particularly the financial sector, but the active dismantlement of government itself in its regulatory capacity. The State and Capitalism become one for purposes of mutual support and fending off opposition, a business polity or commonwealth all else of secondary concern. And now, the billionaires are coming out of the woodwork.

The New York Times (April 1), based on material released the night before, self-reported wealth of officeholders (the president apparently exempted) which I surmise has been consistently under-reported, and had the care and scrutiny of teams of topflight lawyers and accountants, reveals a picture disturbing enough as it stands. The reporters, Jesse Drucker, Eric Lipton, and Maggie Haberman, writing, “Ivanka Trump and Jared Kushner [Trump's daughter and son-in-law, both now officially part of the administration] Still Benefiting From Business Empire, Filings Show,” begin by observing, the couple “will remain the beneficiaries of a sprawling real estate and investment business still worth as much as $740 million, despite their new government responsibilities,” and this fails to include Ivanka Trump's other holdings, well in the millions, a stake in a hotel in Washington near the White House, fashion lines, etc. Divesture for them and the some 180 senior officials in the administration whose assets were reported (already in sheer numbers presumptive evidence of a plutocracy), is problematic and often shrouded in mystery.

Gary Cohn, former president of Goldman Sachs, and now head of the National Economic Council, has “assets valued between $253 million and $611 million [the enormous spread here is illustrative of the examples cited, which argues that self-reporting of assets is not to be trusted, being even greater than cited], and income last year as high as $77 million.” Kellyanne Conway, the pollster and counsel to Trump, “earned at least $842, 614 last year, and perhaps slightly more, the filings show. Her assets are valued at between $11 million and at least $44.2 million.” (Again, the obvious spread.) Her husband has taken an appointment with the administration. And then there is Stephen Bannon, Trump's chief strategist, who has more going for him financially in right-wing circles especially than I can enumerate, including support from Robert Mercer and his daughter Rebekah, for his holdings in Breitbart News Network, Cambridge Analytica, and the Government Accountability Institute, all paying Bannon handsomely in salaries and consulting fees. His Bannon Strategic Advisers Inc. “was valued at between $5 million and $25 million.”

As one goes further, one sees a similar picture, names unknown to the general public, for example, “Reed Cordish, who heads up technology initiatives, accumulated assets as a Maryland developer valued as high as $424 million,” or Christopher Liddell, presidential assistant and director of strategic initiatives, who “had been the chief financial officer of companies including Microsoft, International Paper and General Motors before taking his White House job.” Liddell owned stock in GM, “among more than 750 other companies.” Thus, the dramatis personae of the Trump administration: it is not my purpose to incite to class riots, but surely this is a picture offensive to everything America claims to stand for, a society beneficent, habitable to ordinary people, a land of freedom and social justice. How explain the grossest maldistribution of wealth in American history, and, to my way of thinking, acquiescence to this on the part of large numbers of Americans and a Leader in command of the nuclear arsenal while conducting worldwide exercises in counterrevolution?

I am no longer young, or for that matter, well, but our fights a half-century and more ago for civil rights, peace, disarmament, international understanding, took place in a very different America, where protest, demonstrations, opposition, was expressed and openly honored by many, even in the political community, and where one felt causes were worth fighting for, joined by like-minded individuals. I cannot say as much today, an electorate that brought Trump into office, that watches as the most innocuous reforms, like Meals on Wheels, are being scrapped, a nation too satiated with false consciousness to be shocked any longer by what is happening. Perhaps Vietnam previewed the decline of the American spirit, yet the mindset has grown far worse since then, epitomized by a Trump, his loyal followers, an indifferent America, none appreciating what that mindset is leading to, or silently applauding because democracy is too difficult a strain to live up to or bear, a fascistization of structure, politics, culture, leaving little room for rebirth as a society dedicated to human freedom for all its people.

APRIL 7, 2017

Mr. Xi's Visit: An imaginary Speech

After a most informative discussion on world affairs, I return to China happy in the knowledge that President Trump is what I expected and hoped, a strong leader who will do what we all salute him for, making America great again. The world looks to America for principles of self-reliance (your beloved Emerson) and what we once termed economic nationalism, but which runs deeper, a genuine patriotism of country affirming United States' grand destiny of taking care of its people and keeping the Nation strong. One could not ask for anything better in true political leadership.

Accordingly, in praise of America's and the President's vision, we in China want to further the purposes of that vision as our small contribution to the Land of Freedom, this by carrying out President Trump's often-expressed wish for nation-building at home and independence from the strains and tensions of global involvement.

Mr. President, we will do everything we can to assist you in carrying out your agenda, notably, strengthening America's moral fiber by putting its resources and initiative to work at home. Nothing must undermine the resolve—such as dependence on others—of the American people.

First, to support the spirit of welcoming challenge, I am instructing my government to withdraw all investment from the United States within thirty days (including loans to Jared Kushner); to eliminate all US economic activities, investments, banking-commercial-manufacturing presence in China, also within thirty days; and, as for the yearly trade deficit America has run up of $300B to request immediate payment and the cancellation of all future loans. A genuine friend could not do better, in encouraging America's economic independence.

Second, to ensure America's free hand in realizing its potential, I am instructing our Foreign Ministry to negotiate closer relations with Russia, in a common policy of keeping American goods out of our two countries—not a higher tariff, but again absolute exclusion. No friend of America's rebuilding effort could do less, and in that way honor Mr. Trump's election pledge of achieving self-sufficiency. To that end, I am asking Russia to use its good offices to encourage the European Union likewise to exclude an American presence, while China will work to the same end in Asia, and both Russia and China—again from the desire to see America succeed—follow the same course in the whole of Africa and Latin America. In this way, President Trump can realize his dream of a Fortress America beholden to no-one but itself.

Third, with much of the world rejoicing in America's enjoyment of its power to prosper on its own, especially in allocating its wealth to military and/or nuclear modernization ends, I am instructing China, and asking Russia to do the same, to target principal US population areas as a reminder of peaceful intent, likewise in furtherance of its self-sufficiency, to ask international organizations (e.g., WTO, WHO) to expel the United States from membership, as a favor to Mr. Trump, because simply a diversion from the work to be done at home. As with everything else, he will thank us for our friendship in facilitating his paradigm of excellence.

I have more thoughts about showing our respect and admiration for America, but these three are for starters. America deserves to achieve its fondest ambitions, to win the world's respect by fulfilling its destiny of carrying capitalism to its finest hour: an autarkic fascism surrounded by the wall with Mexico on one side and a northern border, yet to be determined, but armed lest, out of envy, the wrong sort flock in to take advantage of the folk. Not everyone is in full-dress preparatory mode to construct a fascist commonwealth; the world watches breathlessly to see if America can pull it off. Thus far, if billionaires are an index of societal health, America is off to a good start, more so, in this important respect, because it will not allow the poor, the unemployed, the homeless, to gum up the works. If push comes to shove—and the purpose is praiseworthy beyond dispute—the inferior classes, under the heading of infrastructure, can build crematoria, concentration camps, whatever it takes to keep the American Dream pure and unsullied.

APRIL 12, 2017

Anniversary of FDR's Death: "The Only Thing We Have to Fear is Fear Itself"

It is nearly impossible to speak truth to power when the present occupant of the White House (and his predecessors going back at least through Reagan) is already obsessed with expanding power and wouldn't know truth if it hit him between the eyes. Truth is falsified at its inception when power takes on absolutist proportions and pursued in its own right. Cynicism, hegemony, mere acquisition, are notable examples defining a unified core of meaning and understanding, not just characterizing Trump, along with a fascination with domination and cruelty, but also his supporters and, if we were being frank, the majority of Americans, Democrats included.

In an unrelieved political-ideological landscape of haute-capitalist authority and values, the New Deal stands out in American history as the exceptional fragment of a contrived, artificial Exceptionalism (the national mythology) penetrating the epistemological foundations of the society. That bad? Worse still: a quasi-fascist State, in which FDR and the New Deal become a democratic moment of struggle against the forces of wealth, status, vast resources of capitalist accumulation, in Webster's, control, authority, and influence over others. Interpenetration, the mutuality of interest between business and government, capitalism and the State, defines the course—lines of development—of present, and no doubt future, American nation-building. The contrast with the New Deal could not be more striking, even though the earlier political-social formation was not socialist, and signified the potential malleability of capitalism itself (capable of being altered or shaped by outside forces or influences, in this case, government, adapted to democratic ends).

April 12th, FDR's martyrdom is far more consequential and inspiring than that of JFK, if one has in mind, in foreign policy, rallying the people to antifascism rather than counterrevolution, and, domestically, building the political economy around the elevation of the poor and unemployed, rather than a corporatist structure of wealth concentration (as occurred from Kennedy onward through Trump), fragmentation of workers' identity and organization, and now, a direct assault on the concept of welfare and the social safety net. Trump, again, his government, the people who support him, America increasingly in general, avowedly seek the destruction of a people-centered present and future in favor of a highly-structured class system of privilege, elitism, and—perhaps one of the greatest differences with the New Deal—a permeating militarism and spirit of global domination. Can one nation, in the breadth of one lifetime, mark such a gross turnaround in purpose and execution?

Let's turn to FDR's First Inaugural Address, March 4, 1933, passionate, memorable, colorful, yet also sharply denotative in thought and language, above all, confident, the start of a great romance between the president and the American people—the opening:

I am certain that my fellow Americans expect that on my induction into the Presidency I will address them with a candor and a decision which the present situation of our Nation impels. [Compare this with Trump's government by Twitter and tweet.] This is preeminently the time to speak the truth, the whole truth, frankly and boldly. Nor need we shrink from honestly facing conditions in our country today. This great Nation will endure as it has endured, will revive and will prosper. [It is useful to recall just how severe and desperate were conditions at the time, FDR not sweeping under the rug the extent of unemployment and depression, nor creating diversions in foreign-policy adventurism to draw attention away from ineffectual government policies at home.] So, first of all, let me assert my firm belief that the only thing we have to fear is fear itself—nameless, unreasoning, unjustified terror which paralyzes needed efforts to convert retreat into advance.

[This is the start of the First Hundred Days, a time for rebuilding and extending the power and influence of government to meet the challenges of the future, as contrasted with Trump, at eighty-nine days, as I write, focused on the emasculation and destruction of government—in large part a test of their respective views on the intelligence and perspective of the people. FDR continues]: “In every dark hour of our national life a leadership of frankness and vigor has met with that understanding and support of the people themselves which is essential to victory. I am confident that you will again give that support to leadership in these critical days.”

There are many more noteworthy passages from his speeches, writings, press conferences, etc., worth remarking, from “one-third of a Nation....” to “horse-and-buggy days,” to a restatement of the Four Freedoms, on and on into the night, but surely my point is grasped, an effort, in a time of crisis, for the political leadership to address the pain for the individual from the cancer itself, in my case, to a full-court press on achieving societal reconstruction so that through a better health-care system, wellness in all its manifestations will spread its blessings, translated into quality and longevity of life, throughout the social order. That order, be it noted, is an integrated political matrix covering all bases pertinent to and contributing to life as responsive to human needs.

APRIL 17, 2017

The Nazification of Sexuality: Confessions of a Bigot

How far does one publicly dare to question contemporary shibboleths of liberalism/radicalism (my own preference is to distinguish the two; I view liberalism as antiradicalism, a moderate version of corporate capitalism, and hence, not one of my favorites)? More particularly, how open are publications and views with bono vide radical credentials to criticism of, for example, homosexuality and transgenderism? Yes, we all believe in toleration, profess a commitment to open advocacy, provided they fall within the parameters of human rights, which homosexuality and transgenderism certainly do. I am not calling for censure, public hangings, or even gentle criticism—only for a little perspective. Privacy, I believe, is a sacred right. No argument there. Yet, as an old radical (84 next month), with extensive background in practically all areas of radicalism (exception: sexual politics) over a lifetime, and with a diagnosis of terminal cancer staring over me, I feel I am free to speak my mind.

Whether others will want to listen, or grant me that privilege (especially when it goes against conventional radical wisdom), is another matter. This is not engagement in hate-politics, nor, hopefully, an expression of senility, but reflections on how I see as taking one’s eyes off the ball (i.e., a failure to prioritize structural-psychological issues in the face of world realities). To show concern for the liberation of sexual impulses, lifestyles, etc., when the power structure of the United States is moving ever-closer to fascism, is to me (a) a luxury of self-indulgence or of gratification, (b) a societal blindness to issues that affect, as I believe, more fundamental forms of human dignity (notably, the distribution of wealth and power in society, income inequality, enforcement of juridical concepts and provisions of equality before the law and as addressed by local, state, and federal police powers, and (c) a diversion from fighting against the real enemies of human freedom, capitalism, corporatism, fascism, lack of transparent government, perhaps most important right now, militarism, foreign intervention, regime change.

America just dropped on Afghanistan the largest non-nuclear bomb in global history. After the first day, a few references in the press and public discussion, and after that nada, as business as usual is resumed in full splendor—more threats, confrontations, possible interventions. Today, as self-indulgence, societal blindness, diversion, make the news, one feels that the radical vision of societal betterment is vanishing, lost from sight, as though sexuality trumps homelessness, malnutrition, gut-wrenching impoverishment, wars and their preparation, a military budget that sucks the lifeblood from the social-welfare sector, in a word, America as it presently exists, and as it has under bipartisan leadership since the close of World War II.

“Prioritize,” a cold, emotionless word, and yet, it follows disturbingly when it is set against a sexual politics that can only have validity when far more basic problems are first resolved. I know this contradicts prevailing radical opinion, which either looks askance at traditional factors of concern, or else puts sexuality on the same plane as the others as testimony to human rights. What good will the toleration, and for those immediately concerned, the practice of, homosexuality, be if the human race faces annihilation, or if in everyday living people are unemployed, undereducated, some dying prematurely because pollution standards are unenforced or not sufficiently rigorous, or dying prematurely because the pharmaceutical makers and medical profession get away with highway robbery? Much needs to be done, indeed, the whole reconstruction of society (whether or not socialism is the sole legitimate answer?) has to be created, away from war, hegemony, privation, environmental degradation, before rolling up our sleeves and confronting head-on issues of personal liberty.

I’d want very much to see dignity and complete rights freed from ideological stigma accorded to every human being, which obviously must include sexual identity. All of our brothers and sisters have a right to enjoy the sunshine, neither fearing discrimination and ridicule nor the diminution of self-worth because of societal prejudice. So what does this come down to? Build a better society, the democratization of power, but don’t ignore what is before us, which, doing, becomes complicity in a horrid status quo, filled by billionaires taking over government and capitalism becoming identical with the State. As precious as personal liberty is, it does not have to be flagrantly displayed when, e.g., race as a social determinant of condition still obtains or economic standing shapes one’s possibilities for happiness. Enjoy one’s own humanity and that of those one loves, without forcing to the front, and therefore giving conspicuous attention to, what for the moment demands equal or greater notice, than the solution to, yes, specifically economic-political problems crowded out of our field of vision. Don’t trivialize radicalism, which itself, historically and morally, seeks the health, well-being, and pride of every human being, but at the same time, affirm the significance of social structure and ideology in ensuring the fruition of human dignity as an unconditional birthright for all.

JUNE 16, 2017

Farewell Norman Pollack, 1933-2017

by JOSHUA FRANK

This past week we lost one of our most tenacious, prolific voices. Norman Pollack, after a long, arduous battle with cancer, passed away on June 11 at his home in Michigan with his wife Nancy by his side. He was 84.

Norman's legacy stands tall, from his days in the civil rights movement to his tenure at Yale and Michigan State University, he never stopped fighting for social justice. He was not only an author and well-respected scholar, he was also a loving father, husband and a genuine friend of CounterPunch. I will greatly miss our frequent email exchanges that ranged from theater outings with his wife Nancy to his daily battles through multiple rounds of chemotherapy. I never experienced Norman as a professor, but I imagine he would have been dynamic, yet challenging. He often spoke fondly of his former students, especially those who carried on the torch of an activist life.

While Norman's politics were complex, they were also clear-cut. He believed in real left-wing populism, writing several books on the topic over the years. He advocated for building opposition from the ground-up, at all costs. Most importantly, he remained steadfast in his belief that the working class has the spirit to engineer a genuine progressive transformation of society. And if this didn't transpire, he argued, the US would fall into a fascist spiral, indeed he believed we were already on that treacherous course.

Norman was an outspoken, radical Jew who defended the rights of Palestinians and other indigenous peoples. He was a fierce critic of the Bush and Obama administrations, especially extraordinary rendition, drone warfare and US policy in the Middle East, yet he left plenty in his cannon to blast the spectacle of Donald Trump.

Marxists in academia are few and far between these days, and Norman was perhaps the last of his generation. He openly credited his pal Gabriel Kolko as a prime influencer on his political thinking, and like Kolko, Pollack's writings will continue to impact our political discourse for decades to come. I recall Norman telling me how much he missed Kolko when he died, and I can say the same of Pollack now. He'll be deeply missed.

I return often to Pollack's words, especially his condemnation of Israel's domination of Palestinians. Few have written on the issue with more passion and contempt. Here's a snippet from an essay he wrote for us in 2015 titled Israel's Defamation of Judaism: The Rape of the Palestinian People:

"The bombardment of Gaza last summer, a replay of Guernica as a lengthier exercise in domination, artillery replacing the dive bomber, was merely an example of the stored-up hatred and contempt Israelis displayed toward the Palestinians, a twisted mindset crossing the line from punitiveness to outright psychosis as though squashing an ant hill. Israelis do not concede the humanity of their victims, and perhaps do not even see them as victims but mere objects to be pushed around and, as a useful object lesson to them, swept aside, their houses bulldozed, their land taken away, the science of humiliation raised to a fine art."

May we all stay as vigilant as Norman, who, right up to his final days, while he struggled through hospice care, worked alongside Nancy to finalize his forthcoming book Capitalism, Hegemony and Violence in the Age of Drones, which is currently being prepared for publication.

Farewell, Norman. We'll do our best to keep the fight alive. Your spirit will forever live on.